But the mystery of all this is, that, by some unaccountable management, she has reconciled in her own person the most singular incongruities. With all these accomplishments, with all this refinement and grace, and elegant female knowledge, she possesses the power, and what is still more extraordinary, the will to be useful! Nay, what is yet more wonderful, though she is sought for and admired abroad, she can actually bear to stay at home. I have sometimes known her to spend an evening in some little employment of an elegant spinster, when she had half a dozen invitations to pass it abroad; and have been astounded to see her, at the request of some one of the domestic circle, lay aside her needle—ay, her needle! and play and sing an Italian air with almost the skill and expression of the signorina. She is never idle at home; and it is my firm belief, that if the beggars and paupers of the city only exercised half her industry and economy, there would be little use for charitable societies. And all this she does voluntarily; for—and here I advise the young gentlemen of the city, “who spend half-a-crown out of sixpence a day,” to prick up their ears—she is an heiress! An heiress—and yet she actually sometimes makes her own gowns! Do not my fashionable readers shudder at this, and will they not burn your paper for presenting such enormities to their imitation? The fair Portia may, perhaps, ask me—and the question is apt—why I have not fallen in love, and united my fate with this wonderful little girl? The answer is at hand. There is in the chapter of consanguinity a bar to such a procedure. There is not an orthodox person or justice of the peace would tie the bands.

I hope the imperfect sketch I have drawn will exemplify my ideas of the beau, or rather belle ideal of fashionable life. My object in presenting the picture to your readers is to demonstrate the possibility of uniting all the useful acquirements of a domestic character with all the refinements and accomplishments of a well-bred woman. Such alone can be justly called fashionable, since glaring splendors, extravagant dress, and loud pretension, only make vulgarity more offensive, and ignorance more ridiculous.

The fair and sensible Portia complains of the indiscriminate severity of some of your correspondents; and justly expresses her satisfaction, that as yet the morals of the sex of our country are uncontaminated by vices by which the people from whom they borrow their manners and their dress, are supposed to be distinguished. All this may be true; but she appears to forget the inseparable connection between dress, manners, and morals—between habits of dissipation and habits of licentious profligacy.

All experience verifies the fact, that extravagance in dress, and expenditures of every kind, inevitably leads to the practice of showing one's self on all occasions. No woman, or man either, dresses purely to be seen by nobody, or only by the inmates of the house. They must be abroad for that purpose. Hence a habit of dissipating time in the streets, and a habit of living, not for the exercise of duties at home, but for the admiration of strangers abroad. No woman can lose her taste for domestic life without being the worse for it; and no woman can live for admiration alone without losing the dignity of her character and the purity of her soul. She must make sacrifice of both to attain the admiration of fools, coxcombs, and voluptuaries. Those who live only for dress, will, of course, become extravagant, and those who exist only in the hot-bed of public admiration, must, of necessity, loosen that tie which, of all others, is the most important to the character and destiny of woman—the domestic tie—the tie that binds her to herself, her father, mother, or, if she is a wife, to her husband, her children, and her home. The fair Portia will, I trust, now perceive, that a people who are every day losing their domestic habits, and the simplicity of their manners, will not be long distinguished for the purity of their morals.

I take this opportunity to apprise you, Messrs. Editors, of the failure of my hopes at the last fancy ball. I looked out for the fair Portia, but I am sure she was not there, for I should certainly have known her. I was attracted by a group of peasants, thinking I might find my object; but, what is very pretty and innocent in a Swiss peasant, appeared quite otherwise in a fine lady, so I marched off towards a pretty quakeress, who took my fancy wonderfully. But, alas! what was my horror at seeing her whirling about in a waltz with a partner whose whiskers would have frightened any woman with nerves less weak than the strings of a piano. In short, the whole evening was spent in alternate hopes and disappointments. There was one there who I thought realized the dreams of my waking fancy, but she was “mortgaged,” as I overheard one young fellow say to another.

“For how much?” asked he.

“Her intended is worth two hundred thousand dollars!” replied the other.

“Upon my word,” thought I, “the young lady is mortgaged for a good round sum.”

Thus end all my hopes, unless—unless the fair Portia will condescend to unveil the glories of her face to my contemplation. If she refuses, it is a gone case. I have no other refuge but to go to Paris, and study good eating; or stay at home and rail at the extravagance of the sex till I am fifty years old, and then marry the greatest belle about town. Your obedient servant,

ADRIAN MELMOTH.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—Few things have lately occurred more unpleasant to my feelings, and more contrary to my opinions of propriety, than several strictures in your recent numbers upon whiskers, mustachios, ladies' dresses, and the various modes and fashions which, as we advance in civilisation, are becoming prevalent in this community. Your remarks are unquestionably flagrant outrages upon those rules of courtesy which ought always to exist among gentlemen. Both pa and ma are deeply offended at your audacious interference with our rights and privileges; and sisters declare they will cut your acquaintance. Pray, gentlemen, let me ask what business it is of yours if I please to wear whiskers and mustachios? Am I not a freeman? Am I not an American citizen? Have I not travelled all over the civilized world, and studied the fashions in Paris and London; and don't you suppose I know more than you about the proprieties of refined society? Is it for you to hold me up to public ridicule like a criminal, because I wear hair on my upper lip? Take the advice of a friend, and confine yourselves to metaphysical subjects; tell stories of broken-hearted young men, and ladies sick with the misery of unrequited passion; criticize the play-actors, and review books; but let our mustachios alone, or, in spite of the law, expect—you understand me. Things have arrived at a pretty period, indeed, if the genteel portion of the young men of this metropolis must ask permission of editors of periodicals to make their toilet according to their own taste. Let me tell you I will dress as I please, and wear what I please, in defiance of you; and, so far from cutting off those impressive emblems of manliness, which you have presumed to condemn, I shall hereafter bestow additional pains upon their cultivation, and therein follow the example of Shakespeare, Milton, and other writers, almost as celebrated as yourselves. The mustachio is associated with much that is tender and beautiful in poetry and painting, and, by the beard of Mahomet, I will wear mine at the risk of my life.

“There is no power in the tongue of man
To move me from my purpose.”

In conclusion, I wish you distinctly to understand, that I shall consider any future remarks on the subject of whiskers as personal. Your quondam friend, FIGHTING BOB.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—It appears to be quite the rage for distressed young ladies, under strict parental government, and forlorn old bachelors to make their complaints to you; now I put my confidence both in your inclination and abilities to advise your friends, and therefore I address you without hesitation. I wish to know what your correspondent, Adrian Melmoth meant by speaking so irreverently of us young ladies? Even daring to assert that it was a dangerous thing for a young man of domestic habits to think of entrusting his happiness to any of the New-York belles of the present age? Really I am surprised that you would countenance such heretical opinions; so far is it from the truth, that I think the greatest risk is on the lady's side, in most matrimonial engagements—she has the most to fear, for when once her affections are fixed, they remain firm. 'Tis not an idle tale of romance, that when woman loves, it is forever. She is by nature formed to be the charm of the domestic circle, and a refined education can only tend to fit her more eminently for the duties of wife and mother. But do not mistake me—I do not pretend to deny that a false education may destroy all the refinement that naturally exists in the female breast, and render her completely unworthy, and unprepared to perform the proper duties of a woman. Indeed most of our fashionable girls have been educated improperly; either mammae are too ambitious in their plans, or the daughters are too pretty, and become spoiled before they are scarcely fourteen; there are many such, and far more to be pitied than despised. Still, Messrs. Editors,

I think your correspondent might have had some charity for us, and not condemn the whole sex in toto. I could tell you of some—bright, radiant girls; so pure in heart, so unaffected in manners, and withal so devoted in their feelings, that I know not one among you "lords of the creation" worthy to possess their love. Tell Mr. Melmoth for me that he need not go to a fancy ball, nor to any other ball, for a wife, but let him look around among the circle of his acquaintances for some pretty modest creature, and I'll venture to say (unless he is very fastidious) that he will soon become a perfect Benedict. Adieu. Your constant reader, MARY MEDDLER.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—I have this moment received a package through the post-office, which cost me two dollars and seventy-five cents, from a gentleman with whom I have only a slight acquaintance, and on matters altogether relating to his own interests. As many persons residing abroad are guilty occasionally of the same liberty, I find the tax upon my purse rather burdensome, and therefore beg you will print this, that my worthy correspondents in the various parts of the United States may take the hint, and pay postage when they transmit me large packages exclusively affecting their own affairs. Some weeks ago a gentleman requested the loan of a manuscript poem, written by a departed friend, of which I was very choice, as it was of great beauty and rarity. Having business at Baltimore he carried my manuscript with him, and after having sufficiently amused himself with its contents, forwarded it to me by mail, enclosed in a letter of a few brief words of "gratitude" for my politeness, and I paid three dollars to the postman. Please, gentlemen, either give this abominable practice a suitable lashing in your paper, or print my unvarnished effusion for the benefit of myself and all similar victims to the carelessness or parsimony of their friends. Your obedient servant, L.

REMARKS.—We sincerely sympathize with our correspondent. No class of individuals is more exposed to similar impositions than editors. They affect us in various ways. We have to bear the postage of numerous letters, requesting the paper, but without enclosing the amount of the subscription, which, by the way, we never attend to. It also frequently happens that the requisite advance is enclosed, and only half the postage paid, a subterfuge which the penetrating eyes of the post-office clerks invariably detect, and for which we have to suffer. In addition to this we are honored with innumerable literary effusions from distant correspondents, and are continually compelled to pay from twelve-and-a-half to fifty cents for some cherished specimen of fancy, not worth so many farthings. For these wrongs we have no redress, but must go on patiently every day, contributing to the support of the post-office department, with to us a very disagreeable liberality, until our friends will take the trouble to reason a few moments upon the subject, and discover the great impropriety of taking such unwarranted liberties with our purse.—Ede.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

TOO MUCH SUSCEPTIBILITY.

From unfinished memoranda.

"Soft effluvia, shooting through the brain—
Die of a rose in aromatic pain."

POOR Jacob Seymour had too much susceptibility. His heart was tenderness itself. It swelled up into his throat on the most trivial occasions. Unbidden tears were forever rising into his eyes; blushes continually overspread his cheeks; smiles, which he could not check, would beam out like sunshine over his face; his blood boiled with resentment at any incident which bore the remotest resemblance to an insult. Yet he yearned to love every body and every thing. All the world declared he was a good fellow; but he was entirely too susceptible.

He betrayed these traits of character even in his earliest boyhood. His heart seemed ever full to the brim, and the slightest touch shook it to overflowing. What was quite vexatious too, the very peculiarity in his constitution, which perpetually led him astray, rendered it almost impossible for him to bear the consequences. His father was frightened at the sensitiveness of his disposition. His mother loved him the more for it; especially when, after a frown from the former, he would come with his pale cheeks and little blue eyes so full of grief, and hide his face in her bosom.

At seven he was a delicate, fair-complexioned boy. Soft golden hair curled around a sweet girlish countenance. The ladies called him a perfect Cupid. At ten he had expanded into something more of masculine strength, and mama, after long struggles between her duty and feeling, at length consented that he should be sent to boarding-school. Ye susceptible mothers and sons, imagine the parting! Jacob was left in the desolate loneliness of a strange place, with new faces about him. He went out among the crowd of young urchins engaged in their sports, and felt as if his heart would break. This made him wretched for a month, when he began to be interested in the circumstances around him.

At the age of thirteen, he was ordered to prepare for a public examination. He had intended to appropriate the evening previous, to the study of the only page in Euclid which he did not perfectly understand. He had just opened the book and commenced, as the line a b equals the line c d, &c. when his eyes rested accidentally on the blooming form and animated lovely face of his tutor's youngest daughter Mary. She had just reached her fourteenth year. A beautiful and dangerous object to sit by the side of a susceptible youth studying mathematics. It was summer, moonlight, and some how or other they were left to themselves.

The girl hummed a pleasant air, and Master Jacob drew near the window and forthwith struck into a second. Susceptible people are apt to love music. He forgot Euclid till it was too late for further study. The next day his examiner, as ill luck would have it, opened at the very problem which he had failed to learn. Jacob became confused—the class tittered; he was rebuked by the tutor and burst into tears.

The school was dismissed. The voices of his companions were heard from the broad green meadow which formed their play-ground. The tutor also had disappeared, and Jacob was seated gloomy and alone; his aching head bent down upon the desk, and his face covered from the light. He was brooding, poor fellow, over the disgrace he had suffered, and that too in the presence of Mary.

"I could have borne," thought he, "the ungenerous ridicule of the boys, and even the coldness of the master; but to be disgraced and laughed at before her! what must she think of me?" Tears flowed again at the thought, and he sobbed aloud, when an arm upon his shoulder, and a soft hand upon his, startled him from his sad meditations.

He looked up, and the same face which happened to be at that moment so vivid in his memory, was before him in reality. A slight moisture suffused her eyes, and swelled gradually into shining drops, which lay there like dew in the cups of blue flowers. A gleam of rapture thrilled through his soul.

Now, if any good-for-nothing mischievous reader, feels alarm lest I am going to work this up into a romantic story, I beg leave to disclaim any such intention. The girl regarded him merely as a pretty little boy, whereas she was a young lady of fourteen. She had observed the acuteness of his feelings, and knew the cause of his failure, and had now come out of pure pity to soothe him. She was indeed so totally unconscious of any other sentiments than those of a sister, that she even kissed his cheek, put back the curls from his forehead, and held his hand in hers while she proceeded to console him, in a low sweet voice which was perfect music in his ear, and sunk with a delightful feeling into his heart.

This is certainly a strange world, and incredible as it may seem to the wise men thereof, it is my opinion that at that particular moment not one of them, however learned and eloquent he might have been, could have calmed Jacob's troubled thoughts so effectually as did this simple maiden. His tears evaporated; he forgot the master, the rebuke, and the laughter; and when she bade him get up and go out to play, he submitted once more with astonishing resignation as she pressed her full lips upon his forehead, and obeyed her as if she had been a queen.

"I do not care for all the world," said he, as he walked down a little lane by a grove of oaks, whose foliage was touched with the last rays of the sun; and the balmy evening air fanned his cheek; "let my master scold me every day, and let the whole school laugh, if Mary will only come afterwards and tell me not to mind it."

Now the reader may imagine if Jacob's susceptibility caused him such acute sensations both of pain and pleasure, even before the subtle thoughts, interests, and passions of manhood were developed, what must have been his anguish when he mingled with the reckless and jarring throngs of the world in the more advanced stages of human life?

As he grew older his sensitiveness was not diminished; he continued alive to all the varying impressions of surrounding circumstances. He left off Latin and Greek because the master was too cross; he devoted himself assiduously to music and dancing, and was at length dismissed from the establishment, in consequence of a highly censurable circumstance. The authorities were informed that he did one day so tease Miss Helen Moore, by reading to her some verses which he had composed on the subject of Cupid and Psyche, that she snatched the same from his hands; and, in the course of his endeavours to recover them, their lips did actually come so near to each other as to produce a sudden report, which awakened Mademoiselle De L'Orme, the French instructress, a maiden lady of nine and forty, who had been reposing in an adjoining apartment. Mademoiselle De L'Orme was petrified with horror; Helen was in an amazing passion, and poor Jacob was informed that his numerous similar offences had exhausted the patience of the trustees, and that he must pack up and begone.

Jacob had no sooner completed his twenty-first year than he found himself in possession of an independent fortune. One would have deemed him a happy man, endowed as he was with health, education, riches, talents, and an agreeable person. But he was so susceptible that his distresses were sometimes almost greater than he could bear. His unfortunate constitutional weakness displayed itself particularly in an extreme admiration of the diviner sex. The natural warmth of his heart led him to frequent indulgence in matrimonial reflections. He acknowledged that bachelorship was a lonely, inconvenient, and unsatisfactory state; but unfortunately he could never fix upon a suitable companion, but before the question was popped, the parties agreed, and the preliminaries arranged, her image was absolutely banished from his mind by that of some other yet more angelic. If a lady did but speak civilly to him, his heart was in a flame. The lovely Julia had gained his affections, as the phrase is, and it was understood that they were to make a match of it, when he accidentally met the enchanting Henrietta on board a steamboat going up to Albany. He was introduced to her as the boat was passing the state prison. Before they reached Yonkers he felt that his peace of mind was deeply involved, and he squeezed her hand—declared his passion, and vowed eternal constancy just opposite Anthony's Nose. She happened to be acquainted with his disposition, and respectfully rejected his addresses. His first impulse was to hang himself, and he actually walked out to take a last agonizing farewell of nature and to buy a rope, when he was encountered by two handsome witty profligate young men who railed at women and turned every idea of purity and affection into derision. They invited him to a Champagne supper, where he spent the night in riotous debauchery, and foreswore all womankind forever.

A month afterwards he married the daughter of a rich Dutch farmer, on Long Island, endorsed a note for a friend for twenty thousand dollars and became liable for the amount, and is at this moment residing in a wretched hovel, struggling from day to day for the means of sustenance, pining away under the effects of a tender attachment to his wife's youngest sister. LITERARY NOTICES.

Encyclopædia Americana. Edited by Francis Lieber, assisted by E. Wigglesworth and T. G. Bradford. vol. v. 8vo. pp. 622. Philadelphia. Carey & Lea. 1831.

It would be almost superfluous for us to express approbation of this work, or of the manner in which its previous volumes have been conducted. The encyclopædias hitherto published have been unwieldy in their form, and too often intended for individuals already far advanced in scientific knowledge. The learned have used them as references, and superficial readers have soon become either wearied or perplexed with their abstruse and technical style. Mr. Lieber has very judiciously adapted his articles to the comprehension of the general scholar, without diminishing their value in the eyes of the more erudite.

The patrons of the Encyclopædia will lament the death of Dr. Godman, who was to have superintended the zoological department; but that gentleman himself designated Mr. T. G. Bradford as his successor.

We extract the article on Giants, both from its intrinsic interest and as a specimen of the work.

"Giants; a people of extraordinary stature. History, both sacred and profane, makes mention of giants. Nothing is more natural, in ages when the past and the future are connected together only by tradition, than that the height of a tall man should be exaggerated every year after his death. In the same way, a small person would dwindle into a dwarf or a pigmy. The effect which is produced by distance of time is also produced by distance of place, so that a nation of tall men, living on a distant shore, would become, in the tale of the mariner, a race of giants. Nations and individuals, in their childhood, love the miraculous; and any event which deviates from the common course of things, immediately becomes a wonder, on which poetry eagerly seizes; hence the cyclops and lastrigons of the ancients, and the ogres of romance. Instances, however, are by no means wanting, of uncommonly large persons, hardly needing the exaggeration of a lively imagination to make them objects of wonder. According to the Jewish traditions, a people existed before the deluge, of uncommon stature, called the sons of God. And at a much later period, when the Israelites sent spies into the land of promise, they brought back word that the sons of Anak, in Hebron, were giants, and that they themselves appeared like grasshoppers before them. The last of this tribe was Og, king of Bashan, conquered by Moses: he had a bedstead nine cubits long and four cubits broad. In the neighborhood of Jerusalem, a tomb was shown, for a long time after, with the inscription, Here lies the giant Og. In 1670, a tooth was said to have been found in this grave weighing four and a half pounds. The Jewish commentators make Goliath eleven feet high.

"The giants of Greek mythology are believed, by some, to represent the struggle of the elements of nature against the gods, that is, against the order of creation. They were said to have sprung from the blood of Cœlum, which fell into the lap of Terra (the earth.) Their mother, indignant at the banishment of the Titans into Tartarus, excited them to revolt against Jove. They hurled mountains and forests against Olympus, disdaining the lightnings of Jupiter. An oracle having declared that the gods could not conquer except by the assistance of a mortal, Minerva called Hercules to their aid. He slew Alcioneus and Porphyron, the most formidable of the giants. Apollo and Hercules shot out the eyes of Ephialtes; Bacchus slew Eurytus with his thyrsus; Hecate and Vulcan killed Clytus with clubs of hot iron; Neptune hurled a part of the island of Cos on Polybotes; Minerva buried Enceladus under the island of Sicily, and flayed Pallas, and made a shield of his skin. The remainder perished by the hands of other deities, by the thunderbolts of Jupiter or the arrows of Hercules. This fable, perhaps, indicates volcanic eruptions, for which the Phlegrean fields, where the chief scene of this struggle is placed, and where the two principal giants were born, were remarkable. Cos and Sicily, which figure in this fable, are also volcanic. Ovid has described the war of the giants in the beginning of his Metamorphoses.

"Strabo tells of the skeleton of Antæus, found in Mauritania, sixty cubits long. Pliny speaks of a skeleton forty-six cubits long, laid bare by an earthquake in Crete. In the battle between Marius and the Teutones, at Aquæ Sextiæ, the king of the latter, Theutobochus, is represented as a giant. In 1613, his skeleton was pretended to have been found in Upper Burgundy. A brick tomb was discovered, thirty feet long, twelve feet broad, and eight feet high, on which was the inscription Theutobochus rex. According to tradition, a skeleton was in the grave, twenty-five and a half feet long, ten across the shoulders, and five feet through, from the breast bone to the back bone. The thigh bones were four feet long. The bones, the story says, were finally carried to England, and it is not known what became of them. We have similar accounts in the sixteenth century. Thus Dalechamp pretended to have found a skeleton eighteen feet in length; Felix Plater, one of nineteen feet, near Lucerne; and Licetus, one in Sicily, thirty feet in length. But it has long been known that these bones do not belong to giants, but to animals of the primitive world, which, from ignorance of anatomy, were taken for human bones. The Guanches, the original inhabitants of the Canaries, were described by a credulous traveller as appearing to have been at least fifteen feet long, from an examination of their mummies. Similar accounts were given of the Patagonians; but Captain Carteret, who measured several of them, found that most of them were but from six feet to six feet five inches high. The measurements of Wallis agree with this. The ordinary height of men is between five and six feet, and the greatest deviations from this medium height, in Europe, are found in England and Switzerland. Frederick William I, of Prussia, had such a rage for collecting tall men as guards, that a man of extraordinary height could not escape being made a soldier, whatever was his profession; and it is related that Augustus, king of Poland, a man of good stature, could only reach the chin of the tallest man of the Prussian guards with his hand."

The Encyclopædia is neatly printed and will be an addition to any library, as ornamental as it is useful.

Maxwell, a Tale of the Middle Ranks. 2v. 12mo. pp. 257 and 239. J. & J. Harper. New-York. 1831.

This book will compare favorably with almost any of our modern novels. Scott is of course out of the question; but among the rest of the tribe who deluge the press with their two duodecimos a year, there are few of as much talents as Theodore Hook. He has not, to be sure, Cooper's eminent powers of description, nor Bulwer's splendid declamation, but is far before them in easy graceful trifling, and a sparkling, if not always a pure or deep stream of wit. What a contrast, for instance, between some of the scenes in Sayings and Doings and the heavy attempts at drollery of Alderman Van Beverout, or the gaudy glitter of Pelham! Hook's talent is perhaps rather peculiar than high. He excels in acute if not deep observation, in a keen sense of the ridiculous, and in good-humored satire of the thousand little foibles of which we are all guilty ourselves, yet which we delight so much to laugh at in others. He has fancy, but not imagination, and nothing of the fervent poetical temperament. He never shows much romantic feeling, and cannot sentimentalize with a good grace. He mingles in the real world, and satirizes our every-day actions. Drawing his subjects in this way from around him, his stories are seldom extravagant, and his characters seem fresh from the stage of real life. Were we called upon to make a choice, we should decidedly prefer Sayings and Doings to the present production. They have more of our author's peculiar spirit, and are written with less effort. The characters too in the volumes before us, are not strongly enough marked to fix the reader's attention. At the same time it is just what its title page calls it, 'a tale of the middle ranks.' There is nothing inconsistent or extravagant in its incidents; a marriage of interest, an unfortunate and ruinous speculation, and a dishonest son-in-law, are no unusual occurrences, though to be sure, the resuscitation of a culprit unjustly executed, and the eternal passion which Maxwell conceives for a young lady whom he happens to meet once or twice in the street, and who, after the proper allowance of anxiety, turns out to be the daughter of his father's best friend, are rather out of the ordinary course of events. As a whole, however, the tone of this work is easy and natural, its style unpretending, and its story highly interesting.

Marshall's View of London, condensed and arranged in a brief and accurate manner, giving a description of the public buildings, churches, monuments, works of art, bridges, squares, &c. with a concise account of the general outlines of the metropolis of London, its extent and locality, population, climate, &c. illustrated with six views. Peabody New-York. 1831.

Let any reader take a long breath and go through the above title, and then imagine the work which is to be introduced to his attention. Would he not expect something in folio, which he has to place upon his knees and grasp with both hands? The "View of London" happens to be a very different affair. It is emphatically a humbug, consisting of four leaves, on which are one page of letter press and three of plates. The latter have been exhibited at the windows of print-shops any time these fifty years. We are informed by this (as Pedro in Cinderella would say,) "most extensive and tremendous" volume, that "at Crockford's celebrated gambling-house, the net profits for one season were one hundred and fifty thousand pounds. A million of money is said to have changed hands in one night." Our quotations should be longer, only there is nothing else to quote. We regret to see our little friend Peabody getting into such bad practices. The book should have been termed pictures for children, price one penny; and we suspect even then that principles of economy would have prevailed, in many instances, over parental affection.

The Spirit of the Annals, for the year 1831. Philadelphia. F. Little. 18mo. pp. 467.

Although this work appears before the public in a neat form, and is of a moderate size, it does not answer the expectations which naturally arise on opening a volume which professes to contain the "Spirit of the Annals." Notwithstanding the opinion of Newton, that by some chemical action of the elements the whole globe might be condensed within the compass of a nut-shell, we did not anticipate that the vast quantity of Annals, Souvenirs, Bijoux, Carcanets, Gems, Talismans, Keepsakes, &c. &c. would not have produced sufficient valuable matter to eke out the pages of at least one small octodecimo. Yet this we are led to infer by the editor of the Spirit of the Annals, as much of it still smacks strongly of the trashy character peculiar to the originals. The compilation, which appears to have been made from the British gift-books, might have been decidedly improved by admitting pieces from American pens to the exclusion of certain effusions rather remarkable for dullness than beauty. The delightful sketches of Miss Mitford, however, nearly repay one for the price of the volume; and Theodore Hook's story, entitled the Brighton Coach, is arch, interesting, and amusing to the end.

As we do not remember to have seen the annexed touching little poem copied into any of the American prints, we give it a place, although it is by no means equal to the prose of Washington Irving on the same subject.

A TALE OF A MOTHER'S GRAVE.

BY MISS JEWELL.

I sat in a village church-yard,
One day when work was done,
And many a green and lowly grave
Looked bright in the setting sun;
And distant cottages peeped through
The branches of the church-yard yew.

I sat among the sleepers,
(Sleep any like the dead?)
Thinking how soon I might be called
To rest in such a bed;
With wild flowers o'er me growing gay,
And children laughing at their play.

'Twas thus that I sat musing
In the quiet eventide,
When a sudden sound of chariot-wheels
Came from the hamlet side;
I paused—but had not long to wait,
They stopped close by the church-yard gate.

And forth stepped from the chariot
A man in middle life,
With something in his air that told
Of travel, toil, and strife;
And a gleam of passion in his eye
That spoke him not yet fit to die.

And there came with the stranger
The sexton, sad and bowed,
A meek old man, whose locks were white
As is a summer cloud;
They were a crown of light to him
And sanctified his visage dim.

To a grave bound o'er with osier
And unmarked by a stone,
He led the traveller, like a child
That fears to walk alone:
"The grave your honor wished to see
Is lying at your feet," said he.

"God rest thy soul, poor Ellen!"
And with a faltering hand
The old man plucked a weed that grew
From out the osier-band—
And he who in the chariot came
Fell on his knees and did the same.

"Poor Ellen!" said the sexton,
"The parish laid her here,
We little thought that one like you
Would give her grave a tear.
It may be that some time or other
She was your servant?"—"No—MY MOTHER!"

"My mother!"—and the stranger
With these words bowed his head,
And wept aloud upon the turf,
And called upon the dead:
The sexton quietly withdrew:
But I was hidden by the yew,
And heard the words I'll tell ye true.

"Would thou wert back, my mother!
For I never knew thy worth,
Till I had wandered far and long
Upon this weary earth—
Till I had lived full half my span,
And grown a melancholy man!"

"I thought thee harsh and wayward,
Too often, when a boy!
Alas, I never knew how small
Thy share of earthly joy!
The pangs and fears that wrung thy breast,
When I was safely laid to rest.

"Our fare was hard and scanty,
And I with murmurs ate,
Whilst thou, though born to riches vast,
In hunger silent sate;—
It was thy hand that earned our crust,
And now—that blessed hand is dust!"

"I am grown rich, my mother;
I have done deeds of fame;
And thought to make thee now forget
My boyhood's blight and shame;
I come—and spoils of land and sea
Can only deck a grave for thee!"

"Yes—I will build with marble,
And gild with gold thy tomb;
But wert thou in that lowly cot
Amongst the wall-flowers' bloom,—
The very cot I once disdained—
How much of heaven on earth were gained!"

"I thought thee cold, my mother,
Till other love I won,
And then I found that all, to thine,
Was starlight to the sun!
If e'er it passed a cloud of blame,
Its inner glory beamed the same.

"I have been at the revel
In lordly halls at night,
And lovely eyes have on me shone
With youthful, flashing light;
But unto memory more divine
Those pale, meek, weeping ones of thine!"

"Would thou wert back, my mother!
My youth was vain and wild,
But I would kneel before thee now,
A gray-haired, lowly child,
That from its spirit shakes the dust,
And only longs to love and trust!"

And far more said the weeper,
And beat his breast the while,
Confessing to the ear of heaven
His early course of guilt;
Until I deemed it wrong to stay,
And from the church-yard took my way.

O thou! that mayst be reading
This simple tale of mine,
If yet thou hast a mother's heart,
To be a guide to thine—
Cherish her—lest too late to save,
Thou weep in madness o'er her grave!"

We must not forget to mention that the volume is embellished with a pretty frontispiece, engraved by J. Sartain, from a painting by H. Richter, and that the typography is tolerably decent.

The Family Dyer and Scourer; being a complete treatise on the art of dying and cleaning every article of dress, bed and window furniture, silk bonnets, feathers, &c., whether made of flax, silk, cotton, wool, or hair; also carpets, counterpanes, and hearth-rugs. Ensuring a saving of eighty per cent. By William Tucker. From the fourth London edition. 12mo. pp. 180. Philadelphia. E. L. Carey & A. Hart. 1831.

There is much sententious eloquence in Mr. Tucker's idea of saving eighty per cent. Such a proceeding is undoubtedly a desideratum, and if the "Family Dyer and Scourer" really redeems the pledge advanced in the title page, it would be almost superfluous for us to solicit for it the patronage of the public; at least of that portion who have had occasion to be struck with the idea that money is more easily spent than obtained, and we apprehend this comprises a pretty large majority. It is true that authors sometimes entertain peculiar opinions of their own works; and although we avow a most profound respect for that class of our fellow-creatures whom the contingencies of life have driven to such a precarious and unhappy trade, yet we do not always take for granted the truth of what they say of themselves. The present volume is, however, introduced to the American reader in a very favorable manner, having previously run through four London editions. Although no adepts in the mysteries of carpets, counterpanes, and hearth-rugs, the eighty per cent. makes a strong impression, and induces us to extract a sample that the curious may test its value by experiments of their own. The following purports to be a method for cleaning white satins:

"French chalk must be strewed over them, and then well brushed off with a hard brush. Should the satin not be sufficiently cleaned by the first dusting, it may be done a second time, and it will both clean and beautify the satin. The more it is brushed the better."

The author asserts that his recipes and instructions are the result of his own experience, apologizes for and seems to apprehend that some disagreeable consequences will arise from his thus exposing what have been termed the secrets of his trade. Public sympathy must certainly await one who, although he must have recollected the fate of Morgan, has nevertheless ventured upon such a daring enterprise. This free-masonry among the dyers is quite romantic; and we hope that the peril he dares in order to enlighten ladies upon the art of "taking out spots of paint," and "extracting grease from colored muslin," will insure to the "Family Dyer and Scourer" an extensive circulation!

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MASTER BURKE.

THIS bright little star has risen again in our theatrical heaven. As usual, crowds throng to gaze, admire, and wonder, and the Burke mania rages as violently as ever. He struts about in Richard with a ludicrous, and yet beautiful mimicry of manhood. True there is something unnatural in the disproportion between his boyish form and "red face," and the air of matured reflection which pervades his representation; still, however predetermined you may be against persons professing to be precocious prodigies, you find yourself involuntarily delighted. The regular stage walk—the finished attitudes—the haughty folding of the arms—the earnest expression of the face, are at once interesting and amusing. The common interrogation in relation to Burke is, whether his playing is natural or artificial? Is he organized with greater powers of conception than others, or is it only that the faculties requisite to form a player have in him been prematurely developed? Does he entirely understand what he speaks, and would he personate an original character as well as he sustains Richard, Dennis Bulgruddery, &c.? It is apparent that the boy owes his success to the blended influence of nature and education. He must have been originally blessed with a fine organization, and a great facility in learning and in imitating, and these have been well applied and his faculties concentrated upon one subject; but we believe there are lads in this city whom the same education would have rendered equally renowned. A bright, healthy, spirited boy is capable of more than is generally imagined. We remember a child of six years old in an academy in this city who solved in his mind, and in a manner which evinced a perfect understanding of them, problems in arithmetic which might puzzle any intelligent man not accustomed to mental calculation. The same boy spoke both Spanish and English accurately, and was an admirable geographer. We do not wish to detract from the great merit of Master Burke, but only to place his claims for admiration in their true light. He is no prodigy. He is a very charming and intelligent boy, the treasures of whose mind have been highly cultivated and publicly displayed. F.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE FIRSTLING OF THE FLOCK.

To my friend, Alaric A. Watts, Esq.

BY WILLIS G. CLARK.

It was, in sooth, a lonely hour
Which gave thy firstling to the dust,
A perished, but unfolded flower,
Consigned to death in hope and trust!
It was an hour to bid the spring
Of deep and anguished thought go free,
To fetter joy's beguiling wing,
And check his siren melody.
For then, before each parent's eye,
Slept on the dark and lonely bier
The loved, with passion wild and high,
The hope of manhood's stormy year:
There lay the fair illumined face,
Whence scarce the smile of youth had flown;
There lingered yet the nameless grace,
Which sweetened life in moments gone!
How many hopes were clouded there—
How many gladsome rays were hid,
Sweeter than all in earth or air,
Beneath the veil'd and drooping lid!
The glance that wakening love revealed—
That told of childhood's earnest glee—
By death's remorseless hand concealed,
On time's dull waste no more to be!
And yet, methinks, a solemn joy
Might stir thy heart, and fire thine eye
When gazing on that faded boy—
The lost on earth, the found on high!
Something that breathed of sinless hours,
Of soft and ever-sunny skies,
That glitter o'er the vernal bowers
Of an eternal paradise.
Oh, why should love the perished mourn?
They slumber on a peaceful bed;
And unto heaven's eternal morn
Their spirit wings in light are led:
There come no cares the brow to dim,
No tears to fill the cloudless eye;
But joy, that prompts each cherub-hymn,
Broods o'er those dwellers of the sky!

SONNET-TO ***

BY IOLANTE.

Oh chase that dusky shadow from thy brow,
My own beloved one, though a threat'ning cloud
Thou wanderest on with painful steps and slow,
Yet thou dost bear a soul too high and proud
To be by earthly suffering crushed and bowed.
Bear up awhile: e'en as from every blow
That felled the fabled Titan to the earth
He rose with strength redoubled to the strife,
So shalt thou find thy very griefs give birth
To strength sufficient for the ills of life;
Thou'lt stand unblenched mid passion's fearful war,
Then let not sorrow now thy soul's bright sunshine mar.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The late robbery.—Since the good honest times described by the grave and dignified Deiderich Knickerbocker, when the old Dutch ladies durst not go to the pump for water without first setting down their pails, and peeping round the corner to see if the British army was not at hand, the city has not been in such commotion as has prevailed since the late audacious bank robbery. The sensation was universal and startling. The usual method of salutation between friend and friend, "Good morning, sir; fine weather," was exchanged for "Any news of the bank robbers?" It was the topic of conversation in every place—at every time. The other evening while Mr. Jones, as the Prince in Cinderella, was singing "Brightly gleaming," a voice in the second tier was distinctly heard to say, "Two hundred and eighty thousand besides six thousand dollars in gold!"

As the affair became more fully disclosed, all eyes were turned impatiently upon the high constable. He was an object of universal interest and admiration. The ever-watchful guardian of the city's purity, who was supposed to carry about in his head a map of every hole, nook, and corner of the town, besides an accurate list not only of every man who had departed from the straight path, but of all whose virtuous minds were wavering, and whose morals were on the decline, was now expected to sustain his reputation by some sudden and miraculous display. People looked anxiously into his well-known countenance, as he walked through the streets with his arms crossed contemplatively on his back, and all the thousand various narrations of the affair wound up with "Well, no matter—old Hays will catch him!"—"But where has the thief gone?" was asked; "to Philadelphia, Boston, Liverpool, or Calcutta? or does he remain quietly in the city, sheltered beneath fine clothes and a good character, even from suspicion?" The excitement at length rose to its highest pitch. If a five dollar note was presented to a shopkeeper, he looked grave and scrutinizing upon the countenance and habiliments of his customer. The ten thousand dollars reward was worth a little extra ingenuity: and an innocent person who offered a hundred dollar bill to be changed was apprehended, and underwent a strict examination. The selfish interests of mankind, indeed, prevailed to so great a degree, that it is reported of an individual strongly addicted to poetry, but never before suspected of money, that having taken out a two-shilling piece to buy some peanuts, the high constable, who happened to be passing at the moment, fixed his eyes upon him in an awful manner, and desired to know the reason of his embarking in such extraordinary indulgences!

We claim the sympathies of our readers, however, for the gentleman who was so unfortunate as to be the real perpetrator of the deed; with two or three hundred thousand dollars in his trunk and a whole city, nay, a whole nation, like a pack of full-blooded hounds close at his heels, yet hoping that they would lose the scent and pass off in the distance. But old Hays knew what he was about. What would folks who have long entertained opinions unfavorable to the manner in which this trusty officer executes his duty so effectually—what would they have said, had they witnessed the interview between the two gentlemen, namely, himself and Mr. Smith, which led to the disclosure? The latter is said to be social in his habits; but it is shrewdly suspected, that however much he admired Mr. Hays's private character and manners, he experienced some unpleasant sensations on seeing him enter his chamber at the "very witching time of night." Ye painters, immortalize yourselves by the sketch. Ye poets and poetesses, whose names deck the annals of this great metropolis, seize the heavenly lyre and strike the trembling chords!

"We meet again at Philippi," said Cæsar's ghost to Brutus. "Whose trunks are those?" said Mr. Hays to Mr. Smith, and at that identical moment, as every honest lady and gentleman in town well knows, a sudden clap of thunder shook the earth and heavens, and a deluge of rain like unto a cataract, did pour down upon this wicked city, and roll foaming and tumbling along the gutters, whereby the intimacy of the high constable with improper persons came to be apparent.

Newark.—The New-Jersey Eagle, in an article advertising to the rapid growth of that town, anticipates, in the spring, an increase of population to the amount of a thousand. They are constructing edifices there with great industry. A contract has been entered into by some architect of more than ordinary enterprise, for the erection of a large brick building, to be ready for occupation in ten days after the laying of the foundation, under a heavy penalty for every day the owner is kept out after that time. The New-Yorkers and Philadelphians must look about them, or they will have a rival in our little New-Jersey friend; just as we have seen two brilliant belles unexpectedly half-eclipsed by the unpretending charms of a younger sister. The Eagle winds up the article with the following demure and judicious counsel to the new comers:

"We here witness the results of mechanical industry and enterprise—for it is to these we owe our prosperity. And if people are coming to Newark with an expectation of living easier or growing rich faster here than in other places, without using the proper means, they will find themselves wofully mistaken. They must not only be industrious and enterprising as others have been who have grown wealthy, but their industry must be turned to the best possible advantage, and the most rigid economy must be practised in every department of their business and family concerns, otherwise we shall soon find some of their names swelling the list of our insolvents."

We would wager the first year's rent of the new brick house that this same editor of the Eagle is a very sensible man.

The reward.—Mr. Henry Bangs, of this city, has published a statement, by which it appears that he is entitled to the reward of ten thousand dollars offered by the City bank for the apprehension of the robber and the recovery of the money. Smith put up at a boarding-house kept by Mr. Bangs, and by a course of conduct exactly calculated to arouse suspicion, induced him to communicate the fact to Mr. Hays, who, on that information, succeeded in arresting him. There is a mysterious third person in the transaction, of whom we hope to hear soon. It is fully evident that Smith had an associate in the perpetration of the robbery.

MAY THY LOT IN LIFE BE HAPPY.

A BALLAD SUNG BY MISS TREE—COMPOSED BY THOMAS H. BAYLY, ESQ.

Andante Semplice.

May thy lot in life be hap-py, un-dis-turb'd by thoughts of me, The God who shel-ters in-no-cence, thy guard and guide will be; Thy heart will lose the chill-ing sense of hope-less love at last, And the sun-shine of the fu-ture chase the sha-dows of the past. May thy lot in life be hap-py, un-dis-turb'd by thoughts of me, The God who shel-ters in-no-cence thy guard and guide will be.

SECOND VERSE.

I never wish to meet thee more, though I am still thy friend,
I never wish to meet thee more, since dearer ties must end;
With worldly smiles, and worldly words, I could not pass thee by Nor turn from thee unfeeling with cold averted eye.

THIRD VERSE.

I never wish to meet thee more, yet think not I've been taught,
By smiling foes, to injure thee by one unworthy thought;
No! blest with some beloved one, from care and sorrow free,
May thy lot in life be happy, undisturb'd by thoughts of me.

A CHAPTER ON PHYSIOGNOMY.

WHOSOEVER has black frizzly hair and beard, will put his barber to much trouble, and will be liable to scratch his head often, unless he makes great use of a comb.

He who has a low forehead, full of wrinkles, will look like a monkey, ten to one.

He who has a high forehead, will have his eyes under it, and live all the days of his life. This is infallible.

Those who have little or no noses, will chance to look like death's heads while living. They will scarcely ever be detected in sneezing, because it will puzzle them to take snuff.

A great mouth from ear to ear signifies much foam and no bridle. These are not hard mouthed but all mouth.

A little mouth, drawn up like a purse, denotes darkness within, and hides a bad set of teeth.

He that has great hands will have large fingers; and if he strike hard, it will fall heavy.

Sparkling eyes will be almost certain to shine.

Whenever you see a man that has but one eye, you may certainly conclude he has lost the other.

Those who squint will put others to much trouble to decide which way they look.

Left-handed men are very ignorant, for it seems they don't know their right hand from their left; since the one has the office, the other the place.

Never have anything to do with a crooked man, for he can never be upright so long as he goes bowing.

CHAPTER OF DIVINATION AND ASTROLOGY.

Much rain is a sign of wet weather.

When the moon is in Pisces she is keeping lent; she will decrease, and lanterns will be carried about at night.

Whenever the moon is in Taurus, there is no doubt but that the sun will rise in the morning.

Jupiter in Libra looks like a grocer weighing with false scales, and denotes there will be summer and winter that year.

Venus in Gemini denotes that coquettes will not be satisfied with less than two admirers.

Mercury in Leo foreshows distempers in those that eat abundance of melons and cucumbers, and that the sick will die if they send for a physician.

The moon in the dragon's head signifies the dragon has a head.

The full moon signifies she can hold no more, and this may be reckoned for certain.

An eclipse of the sun denotes that it will be dark while it lasts, that astrologers will tell abundance of lies, and fools will believe and mighty men will dread.

A blazing star foretells that abundance of people of all sorts will be looking at it; and if it be fiery, all the princes will die that year who cannot live till the next.

A CHAPTER OF OMENS.

If you are going to buy a thing, and when you should pay for it, cannot find your purse, it is the worst thing that can happen, and unlucky for your marketing.

If you are going to fight, and drop your sword, it is much better than if you had dropped off; but if you happen to drop it when you are fighting, and your head is broken, the omen is bad for you, but good for the surgeon.

Friday is an unlucky day for those who travel a-foot without money, and for those who are hanged.

If you happen to spill the salt, to prevent the ill omen take it up and eat your dinner; or if you will not, rise presently from table, and eat nothing that day, which is the way to fulfill the omen, it being no small misfortune to fast.

All those are unlucky days and unfortunate hours to them on which a constable seizes a criminal, a bailiff arrests a debtor, a gamester draws in a dupe, a great man discovers a flatterer, and a coquette ensnares a young man.

A CHAPTER OF HOW THINGS ARE TO BE DONE, AND ON WHAT DAYS THEY MAY PROVE FORTUNATE.

Sunday the sun rules. It is a good day to sponge for a dinner, and it does no harm though it is better than ordinary: for, according to Galen and Hippocrates, surfeits that cost nothing are not dangerous.

On Monday buy all that you can meet with at an under price, or very good, and take what is to be had for nothing.

On Tuesday receive all that is given to you, without once excusing yourself or drawing back, for it is Mars' day; and he will look upon you with an ill aspect if you should refuse the first offer, and not have a second.

On Wednesday ask of every body you meet, and perhaps Mercury may give some one vanity enough to grant you something.

Thursday is a good day to believe nothing that flatterers say. Friday is a proper day to shun a creditor, an arrest, or any one that would sponge upon you for a dinner.

Saturday is as convenient a day as any to lie abed in the morning, to walk at your ease, to eat a hot dinner, to talk at pleasure, to wear good clothes and easy shoes, because Saturn is old and loves ease.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO THE FIRST SWALLOW.

BY WILLIAM P. PALMER.

AND is it thy glad notes I hear,
Fond bird of restless wing,
Rejoicing on the southern gale,
At this sweet hour of spring?
Welcome to all thy former haunts
In vernal beauty drest,
And to my quiet cottage eaves,
Where hangs thy sheltered nest:
But not as thou didst leave its home,
Ere winter chilled the year—
Ah, no; the reckless winds have held
Their mighty revels there;
And they have strown its airy down
O'er nature's budding scenes;
But thou canst soon repair the wrong,
Nor shalt thou lack the means.
We have been grieved, fond social bird,
At thy protracted stay,
And sighed that one we loved so well,
Should linger thus away:
But there were hearts in that far clime
To whom thy note was dear,
And therefore we may chide thee less—
In friendship, who's severe?
Thrice welcome back from southern lands,
To this sweet vale of ours,
Glad harbinger of summer's smiles,
Her music and her flowers!
Even while I list thy first spring note,
Gay fancy wakes the throng;
I catch the scented gales of June,
The reaper's twilight song.
I owe thee much, and well my heart
Its gratitude shall prove,
For thou hast taught me many a theme
Of patience and of love.
Then rove at will my small demesne,
In thy wild joyance free,
And take whatever thou fanciest,
I give it unto thee:
The bright expanse of yon fair lake,
In all its silvery sheen,
The clear depths of the stilly air,
Hill-slope and valley green—
And more than all, my cottage eaves,
To thee, sweet bird, belong—
Here mayest thou pass thy peaceful life
Of sunshine and of song!

ORIGINAL TALES.

IMPUDENCE AND MODESTY.

A FAMILIAR SKETCH.

"I HAVE heard a great deal of your boys, Mr. Murray," said a lady to an affectionate father, as she called on a brief visit to his family; "you must favor me with their company a little while."

As she spoke the door opened, and the nurse introduced two lads, of about six and seven. After divers exclamations of admiration, affection, and delight; after she had kissed their lips, shaken their hands, put back the hair from their foreheads, asked them their names, and gone through all the other preliminaries usual on such occasions, Mr. Murray, with the true father's feeling, commenced the display of their respective talents.

"Come, Charles," he said to the youngest, "stand out upon the floor, my son, and speak your piece. Now, hold up your head, turn out your toes, and begin."

Charles seemed by no means abashed, and obeyed without hesitation. He took his stand with fearless confidence, stretched his hand boldly forth, and shouted out,

"Romans, countrymen, and lovers!"

with real school-boy grace, affording innumerable and most satisfactory evidences that he had not the most distant idea of the meaning of a single word he uttered. When the elegant specimen of elocution was finished, he scraped his foot on the carpet, performed an energetic movement of the head and body, intended for a bow, and walked up to the visitor with an air of gratified pride. She was, of course, astonished and enraptured; kissed him six times, and said she hoped to see him a bishop or a member of congress one of these days.

"Now, Henry," said Mr. Murray, "let us see what you can do. Don't be afraid, my boy. Show Mrs. Jackson that you can speak as well as your brother."

Henry shrunk away behind his father's chair, and when placed by him gently on the floor, in the full gaze of the company, hung his head, twirled his buttons, looked down, and said not a word. The more they persuaded, the less capable he appeared of venturing upon the task, until the clouds upon his countenance gave such signs of an approaching shower, that the lady was fain to beg that he might be excused. The father piqued himself upon being a disciplinarian. "My children must obey me," was his motto; and, as he himself had, without any sort of talent, and a very slender stock of learning, succeeded in business by dint of always pushing a-head, taking care of himself, undertaking whatever came in his way, and never losing advantage for want of asking, he looked upon the timidity of his elder son as mere obstinacy, which could only be eradicated by the most rigid and uniform severity.

Henry was, therefore, startled by an angry command to obey or leave the room; a flood of tears was the consequence, and the little delinquent, sobbing as if his heart would break, was ordered up stairs to his apartment, while the successful orator was loaded with praises and congratulations.

In the course of time the kind, but mistaken father, was gathered to the church-yard. Although while living the income of his business had been sufficient for the support of his family, it was soon found that the two young men, now arrived at the age of fourteen and fifteen, must depend upon their own exertions for a livelihood, and the executor of his will resolved that one should enter the navy and the other pursue a profession.

"Come here, my poor boys," he said to them a few weeks after the loss of their father, "which of you is willing to turn sailor? I have the means of obtaining a midshipman's warrant for one, and the other shall enter the office of my friend Mr. L., and I hope distinguish himself as a member of the bar."

Henry looked timidly up and said nothing.

"I'll be the lawyer," said Charles.

"But I am afraid, Charles," said the guardian, "you have no tact that way. Henry is studious, and much better calculated to acquire and retain a knowledge of that arduous profession; and you are just bold and saucy enough to push your way along among strangers."

Although Henry had every reason to know that his brother was totally destitute of capacity to study, write, or speak, as he himself had composed nearly all the school compositions for both, yet he only said,

"I fear I should never succeed in any thing which requires either talent or great study; and to rise with the purpose of addressing an assemblage would take away my breath."

"As you please," said the guardian, and Henry was shortly afterwards cutting the ocean for the Mediterranean; and Charles stationed in the office of an eminent counsellor, with the appalling medley of "Tidd's Practice" staring him in the face.

The young officer on board the ship soon made friends; but he also encountered enemies. His quiet and unobtrusive manners rendered him often the subject of derision, which was increased by the care with which he avoided giving offence, and the good nature he displayed under the cruel jests of his companions. Encouraged by the apparent weakness of his disposition, one of them uttered in his presence a remark so glaringly insulting that his modesty was forgotten, and he knocked the bully down. A duel was the consequence, in which his antagonist was shot through the arm. The captain complained to the secretary of the navy, and the names of the offenders were erased from the rolls. With neither money nor profession, Henry returned to the city of his birth, and found his brother presiding as chairman in a political meeting. He had been recently admitted to practice, and was soon after appointed to several lucrative offices, which brought him in a good income.

"Bless my soul," said he, "what's to be done for Henry? You must go to Washington, and apply to be reinstated. Whom do you know in this city?"

"Nobody," answered Henry.

"What friends have you on board the ship, and among the navy officers generally?"

"None," answered Charles. "I have never sought the acquaintance of the powerful, either there or here. My confidential friend is as young and friendless as I am."

"You must write yourself, then, to the secretary."

Henry did so. He explained how he had been absolutely driven to the course which he had pursued, and respectfully requested that he might be permitted to resume his station.

A brief, cool reply, in the hand of a clerk, was received in answer, informing him that it was utterly impossible to move any more in the affair.

"I'm a ruined man," said he, on reading the letter.

"You're a fool," said his brother. "PU go to Washington. The secretary shall reinstate you, or I will know the reason."

"He is mad," thought poor Henry, as his brother bade him good-by, and stepped on board the steam-boat.

But Charles was not mad. He had procured letters from politicians; a strongly contested election was approaching; his name was known as an active and rather influential man. He stood up boldly before the secretary, handed his letters, and said,

"He must be reinstated, Mr. Secretary. I have set my heart upon it."

"It shall be done," Mr. Murray. And it was done.

They had now reached an age when people fall in love, of course. They were both well made, well spoken, and very genteel young men.

"I wish you to look over my books, Mr. Scott," said Charles one day to a fine-looking old gentleman, with silvery locks, whose carriage during his brief visit stood at the door; "you see my expenditures—here is my income. I am a business man, a thriving man, and," laying his hand on his bosom, "a man of honor. I love your daughter, Mr. Scott; and I have never perceived that the young lady was particularly unfriendly to me. There is no doubt that — will go in for president; and here is a letter from him, which you are at liberty, in the strictest confidence, to read."

The father took a pinch of snuff, drew out from his pocket a pair of spectacles, placed them astride his nose, and examined the book and letter with great attention. He was a grave man, and business to the very core of his heart. He did not smile, but a placid contentment half lighted his time-stamped countenance, and gave a sort of grace even to the wrinkles on his forehead. Charles thought he looked beautiful.

"What say you, Mr. Scott?"

"I have nothing to say upon these subjects," he answered.

"I leave the whole affair entirely to Henrietta."

"I shall see you again soon, my dear friend," said Charles, squeezing the old gentleman's hand with a tender pressure, as if his thoughts were wandering away to some other subject.

"The sooner the better," said Mr. Scott, as he stepped into the carriage.

That very night Henry stood at the door of a splendid mansion, with a hand that almost trembled as it touched the bell. Strange what could weaken with a tremulous feeling one so familiar with the dangers of the stormy sea, and whose soul only gathered strength, daring, and calmness as perils multiplied around it. He was now, however, arrayed with something of taste. Nothing is better calculated to set off a genteel form than the uniform worn by the officers of the navy. His fine features, embrowned with manly beauty—his dark and animated eye, and sweet voice, were all well enough in the gaze of a young lady, perfectly guileless, affectionate, open-hearted, and for whom it was just as natural to fall in love, as it is for the rose-bud to unfold its leaves. Such a one the youth had now come to visit. He had known her before he went to sea, as a dear little girl whom he kissed whenever he pleased, for she was but a child. Now she had undergone beautiful transformations. Time had been busy in disclosing a thousand charms of mind and person; and as they resumed their acquaintance the familiarities of friendship gradually dissolved into the subtle tenderness of lovers. As they met this evening, those acquainted with the mysterious affinities of the human heart, and the manner in which feelings, which they strive to conceal, betray themselves, would have noted the particular kindness which appeared more in the manner than the words of both.

"Your brother Charles is in the next room," said Henrietta, "and has been closeted with my father for an hour."

But perhaps the reader will more clearly comprehend what I would reveal by an extract from a letter written by Henry, to a friend in the Mediterranean, the very evening above alluded to:

"It is now exactly midnight. The last peal of a neighboring clock is just dying away upon the air of one of the most delicious nights that ever made earth seem like heaven. The moonlight is splendid. All around is silent, and the beautiful deserted streets show like fairy-land. I have seen Henrietta again and again since I wrote you last, and every time has plunged me (why should I deny it?) more deeply in love. I never before knew the weakness of my resolution, nor the great, the overwhelming force of my feelings. You know I am generally distant, reserved, critical, and philosophical. I look on women as I do on paintings—as an amusement which should never interfere with the more serious duties of my life—and as for marrying, so many apparently insurmountable obstacles have intervened—I have so little faith in the constancy and the depth of passion of the fairer sex—I am so impressed with the certainty that the great majority are carried away by mere glittering show, and so fearful of staking the happiness of my life upon one who would not have either the intellect or the disposition to comprehend me, that I have always cherished a conviction that I am to pass through this world alone—utterly alone. Could you, dear Frederick, but once look on the being who has swept away all my lofty principles, opinions, and determinations, you would not deride me. To me she is a perfect enchantress. I have no will of my own—no thoughts but of her—no secret dream of happiness in which she does not share. I thrill to touch her hand. I would give millions for a curl of her hair. I cannot conceive of the slightest charm or interest in life without her. I am her very slave. Is this love, or is it madness? Yet I have never spoken to her upon the subject. She is very wealthy. I am a needy adventurer. I sometimes think it is all but a dream, and resolve to forget her. When, the other evening, I spoke jestingly of marriage, and told her friend that I had selected a lovely Italian girl for my choice, I could half imagine that I read in her eyes, as they were turned on me, a look of reproach and incredulity, and that about her lips a smile lurked as if she knew I was trifling with my feelings and hers. And is there then an intercourse between beings like us—a secret, mysterious instinct which opens to each other the inner pages of the heart through all the artificial ceremonies which veil them from others?"

The reader will now peruse a letter from Mr. Charles Murray, to a member of congress, at Washington:

"Our party is every day gaining ground in this city. I enclose you the proceedings of a large meeting of the citizens, and recommend you to have them re-published in your city. There can be no doubt of the election of B. We have concentrated our forces here for a strong effort, &c. &c."

"P. S. I have it in contemplation to change my situation. An alliance with the family of our friend Scott would be quite an important event in my life. The charming Henrietta is entirely guided by the wishes of her father, and the ceremony will take place in a few months."

We must trespass upon the patience of the reader for one more brief specimen of epistolary correspondence. The young lady wrote to her confidential friend as follows:

"Believe me, my dear Julia, your suspicions are wrong. Mr. Henry Murray has never thought of me as his wife. I have ever forgotten myself in a momentary partiality for him; I have endeavored to correct my error, especially as he discovers no intention of addressing me. I am an old friend of his, and he probably thinks it his duty to pay me attentions accordingly. But if his wishes were as you have conjectured, there is no reason why I should not have been acquainted with them. On the contrary, he has never overstepped the limits of the most ordinary friendship, and it is not certainly consistent with the delicacy of a female to seek, by her own conduct, to elicit any explanation. On the contrary, I have, and I think successfully, feigned the most volatile spirits—and if ever, in an unguarded moment, I have betrayed any thing like "tenderness," as your phrase is, rest assured I have made up for it afterwards by ten times as much coquetry. There was a suspicion in the family that I—we—but no matter. My father questioned me on the subject, and I answered promptly no, upon which he desired me to receive the visits of his brother Charles, who is everything kind and good, and with whom I have no fault to find but that he is not Henry. I sincerely respect him, and perhaps could be as happy with him as any other. Burn this silly scrawl, and believe me yours," &c."

A few days after the composition of these letters, Henry received orders for sea. Charles had communicated to him his prospects without observing the anguish with which it was received, and Henry felt that he had mistaken her friendship for him, for a stronger attachment. His next letter to his confidant was dated Florida, and contained the following observation:

"I have awakened from the dream which I was so weak as to betray in my last. I have before me a newspaper containing the information of Henrietta's marriage to my brother Charles. I shall weather many a rough gale before I see her again, and it shall go hard with me, but I will forget her before I revisit my native place."

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

THE annexed tale, founded on oriental opinions, was selected, some forty odd years ago, from the Edinburgh Magazine, and inserted in a periodical published in this city by Mr. Swords. Advancing on the delusive stage of life, little did the selector at that period, imagine, that in the course of its many changing scenes, he might share the ingratitude experienced by Don Torribio, and exclaim with him, "Jacintha, spit but one partridge, the dean will not stay here to-night." Possibly ere the like number of years revolve, many of the now young readers of the Mirror may be exposed to the dire necessity of making the same painful exclamation. But my thin, remaining locks, silvered over by the snows of nearly fourscore winters, admonish me not to be censorious. SENEX.

THE DEAN OF BADAJOZ.

By the Abbé Blanchet.

The dean of the cathedral of Badajoz was more learned than all the doctors of Salamanca, Coimbra, and Alcala, united. He understood all languages, living and dead, and was perfect master of every science, divine and human, except that, unfortunately, he had no knowledge of magic, and was inconsolable when he reflected on his ignorance in that sublime art. He was told, that a very able magician resided in the suburbs of Toledo, named Don Torribio. Immediately he saddled his mule, departed for Toledo, and alighted at the door of no very superb dwelling, the habitation of that great man.

"Most reverend magician," said he, addressing himself to the sage, "I am the dean of Badajoz. The learned men of Spain all allow me their superior, but I am come to request from you a far greater honor—that of becoming your pupil. Deign to initiate me in the mysteries of your art, and doubt not but you shall receive a grateful acknowledgment, suitable to the benefit conferred and your own extraordinary merit."

Don Torribio was not very polite, though he valued himself on being intimately acquainted with the best company in purgatory. He told the dean he was welcome to seek elsewhere for a master in magic, for that, for his part, he was weary of an occupation which produced nothing but compliments and promises, and that he would not dishonor the occult sciences by prostituting them to the ungrateful.

"To the ungrateful!" cried the dean; "has then the great Don Torribio met with persons who have proved ungrateful? and can he so far mistake me as to rank me with such monsters?" He then repeated all the maxims and apothegms which he had read on the subject of gratitude, and every refined sentiment his memory could furnish.

In short, he talked so well, that the conjuror, after having considered a moment, confessed he could refuse nothing to a man of such abilities, and so ready at pertinent quotations.

"Jacintha," said he, calling to his old woman, "lay down two partridges to the fire; I hope my friend the dean will do me the honor to sup with me to-night."

At the same time he takes him by the hand, and leads him into his cabinet; there he touches his forehead, muttering three mysterious words, which I must request the reader not to forget, Ortobolan, Pistafrier, Onagriouf; then, without further preparation, he began to explain, with all possible perspicuity, the introductory elements of his profound science.

His new disciple listened with an attention which scarcely permitted him to breathe, when, on a sudden, Jacintha enters, followed by a little man, in monstrous boots, and covered with mud up to the neck, who desired to speak with the dean on very important business.

This was the postillion of his uncle, the bishop of Badajoz, who had been sent express after him, and had galloped quite to Toledo before he could overtake him. He came to bring him information that, some hours after his departure, his grace had been attacked by so violent an apoplexy that the most terrible consequences were to be apprehended. The dean heartily cursed (inwardly that is, and so as to occasion no scandal) at once the disorder, the patient, and the courier, who had certainly all three chosen the most impertinent time possible. He dismissed the postillion, telling him to make haste back to Badajoz, whither he would presently follow him. After which he returned to his lesson, as if there were no such things as either uncles or apoplexies.

A few days after, he again received news from Badajoz, but such as was well worth hearing. The principal chanter and two old canons came to inform the dean that his uncle, the right reverend bishop, had been taken to heaven, to receive the reward of his piety; and that the chapter, canonically assembled, had chosen him to fill the vacant bishopric, and humbly requested he would console, by his presence, the afflicted church of Badajoz, now become his spiritual bride.

Don Torribio, who was present at this harangue of the deputies, endeavored to derive advantage from what he had learned, and, taking aside the new bishop, after having paid him a well-turned compliment on his promotion, proceeded to inform him that he had a son, named Benjamin, possessed of much ingenuity and good inclination, but in whom he had never perceived either taste or talents for the occult sciences. He had, therefore, he said, advised him to turn his thoughts towards the church, and had now, he thanked heaven, the satisfaction to hear him commended as one of the most deserving divines among all the clergy of Toledo. He therefore took the liberty, most humbly, to request his grace to bestow on Don Benjamin the deanery of Badajoz, which he could not retain together with his bishopric.

"I am very unfortunate," replied the prelate, apparently somewhat embarrassed; "you will, I hope, do me the justice to believe, that nothing could give me so great pleasure as to oblige you in every request. But the truth is, I have a cousin, to whom I am heir, an old ecclesiastic, who is good for nothing but to be a dean; and if I do not bestow on him this preferment, I must embroil myself with my family, which would be far from agreeable. But," continued he, in an affectionate manner, "will you not accompany me to Badajoz? Can you be so cruel as to forsake me just at the moment when it is in my power to be of service to you? Be persuaded, my honored master; we will go together; think of nothing but the improvement of your pupil, and leave me to provide for Don Benjamin; nor doubt but, sooner or later, I will do more for him than you expect. A paltry deanery, in the remotest part of Estremadura, is not a benefice suitable to the son of such a man as yourself."

The canon law would, no doubt, have construed this offer of the prelate's into simony. The proposal, however, was accepted; nor was any scruple made by either of these two very intelligent persons. Don Torribio followed his illustrious pupil to Badajoz, where he had an elegant apartment assigned him in the episcopal palace, and was treated with the utmost respect by all the diocese, as the favorite of his grace, and a kind of grand vicar.

Under the tuition of so able a master the bishop of Badajoz made a rapid progress in the occult sciences. At first, he gave himself up to them with an ardor which might appear excessive; but this intemperance grew, by degrees, more moderate, and he pursued them with so much prudence that his magical studies never interfered with the duties of his diocese. He was well convinced of the truth of a maxim, very important to be remembered by ecclesiastics, whether addicted to sorcery or only philosophers and admirers of literature, "that it is not sufficient to assist at learned nocturnal meetings, or adorn the mind with the embellishments of human science; but that it is also the duty of divines to point out to others the way to heaven, and plant in the minds of their hearers wholesome doctrine and christian morality."

Regulating his conduct by these commendable principles, the learned prelate was celebrated throughout christendom for his merit and piety, and promoted, when he least expected such an honor, to the archbishopric of Compostella.

The people and clergy of Badajoz lamented, as may be supposed, an event, by which they were deprived of so worthy a pastor; and the canons of the cathedral, to testify their respect, unanimously conferred on him the right of nominating his successor.

Don Torribio did not neglect so alluring an opportunity to provide for his son. He requested the bishopric of the new archbishop, and was refused with all imaginable politeness.

"He had," he said, "the greatest veneration for his old master, and was both sorry and ashamed it was not in his power to grant a thing which appeared so very a trifle; but, in fact, Don Ferdinand de Lara, constable of Castile, had asked this same bishopric for his natural son; and, though he had never seen that nobleman, he had, he said, some secret, important, and, what was more, very ancient obligations to him. It was therefore, an indispensable duty to prefer an old benefactor to a new one; but that he ought not to be discouraged at this proof of his justice, as he might learn by that what he had to expect when his turn arrived, as it certainly would on the very first opportunity.

This anecdote concerning the ancient obligations of the archbishop, the magician had the goodness to believe; and rejoiced, as much as he was able, that his interests were sacrificed to those of Don Ferdinand.

Nothing, therefore, was thought of but preparations for their departure to Compostella, where they were now to reside; though these were scarcely worth the trouble, considering the short time they were destined to remain there; for, at the end of a few months, one of the pope's chamberlains arrived; who brought the archbishop a cardinal's cap, with an epistle, conceived in the most respectful terms, in which his holiness invited him to assist, by his counsel, in the government of the christian world; permitting him, at the same time, to dispose of his mitre in favor of whom he pleased.

Don Torribio was not at Compostella when the courier of the holy father arrived. He had been to see his son, who still continued a priest, in a small parish at Toledo; but he presently returned, and was not put to the trouble of asking for the vacant archbishopric. The prelate ran to meet him with open arms.

"My dear master," said he, "I have two pieces of good news to relate at once. Your disciple is created a cardinal, and your son shall shortly be advanced to the same dignity. I had intended, in the meantime, to have bestowed on him the archbishopric of Compostella; but, unfortunately for him, or rather for me, my mother, whom we left at Badajoz, has, during your absence, written to me a cruel letter, by which all my measures have been disconcerted. She will not be pacified unless I appoint for my successor the archdeacon of my former church, Don Pablos de Salazar, her intimate friend and confessor. She tells me it will certainly occasion her death if she should not be able to obtain preferment for her dear father in God; and I have no doubt but what she says is true. Imagine yourself in my place, my dear master. Shall I be the death of my mother?"

Don Torribio was not a person who would incite or urge his friend to be guilty of parricide; nor did he indulge himself in the least resentment against the mother of the prelate.

To say the truth, however, this mother he talked of was a good kind of woman, nearly superannuated, who lived quietly with her cat and maid-servant, and scarcely knew the name of her confessor. Was it likely, then, that she had procured Don Pablos his archbishopric? Was it not far more probable that he was indebted for it to a Gallician lady, his cousin, a young widow, at once devout and handsome, in whose company his grace the archbishop had frequently been edified during his residence at Compostella? Be it as it may, Don Torribio followed his eminence to Rome. Scarcely had he arrived in that city before the pope died. It is easy to imagine the consequence of this event. The conclave met. All the voices of the sacred college were unanimous in favour of the Spanish cardinal. Behold him, therefore, pope!

Immediately after the ceremonies of his exaltation, Don Torribio, admitted to a secret audience, wept with joy while he kissed the feet of his dear pupil, whom he saw fill with so much dignity the pontifical throne. He reminded his holiness of his promises, those inviolable promises, which he had renewed before he entered the conclave. He hinted at the hat which he had quitted on receiving the tiara; but, instead of demanding that hat for Don Benjamin, he finished, with most exemplary moderation, by renouncing every ambitious hope. He and his son, he said, would both esteem themselves too happy if his holiness would bestow on them, together with his benediction, the smallest temporal benefit; such as an annuity for life, sufficient for the few wants of an ecclesiastic and a philosopher.

During this harangue, the sovereign pontiff considered within himself how to dispose of his preceptor. He reflected that he was no longer very necessary; that he already knew more of magic than was sufficient for a pope; that it must be highly improper for him to appear at the nocturnal assemblies of sorcerers, and assist at their indecent ceremonies. After weighing every circumstance, his holiness concluded that Don Torribio was not only a useless, but a troublesome dependant; and, this point decided, he was no longer in doubt what answer to return. Accordingly, he replied in the following words:

"We have learned with concern, that, under the pretext of cultivating the occult sciences, you maintain a horrible intercourse with the spirits of darkness and deceit; wherefore we exhort you, as a father, to expiate your crime by repentance, proportionable to its enormity. Moreover, we enjoin you to depart from the territories of the church within three days, under pain of being delivered over to the secular arm, and its merciless flames."

Don Torribio, without being disconcerted, immediately repeated aloud the mysterious words which the reader was desired to remember; and, going to the window, cried out, with all his force, "Jacintha, you need spit but one partridge, for my friend the dean will not sup here to-night." This was a thunderbolt to the imaginary pope. He immediately recovered from a kind of trance, into which he had been thrown by the three magic words, when they were first pronounced; and perceived that, instead of being in the Vatican, he was still at Toledo, in the closet of Don Torribio, and saw by the clock it was not yet a complete hour since he first entered that fatal cabinet, where he had been entertained with such pleasant dreams. In that short time he had imagined himself a magician, a bishop, an archbishop, a cardinal, a pope; and at last he found he was only a dupe and a knave. All was illusion, except the proofs he had given of his deceitfulness and evil heart. He instantly departed, without speaking a word, and, finding his mule where he had left her, returned to Badajoz, without having made the smallest progress in the sublime science in which he had proposed to become an adept.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 103.

THE season of birds and flowers, of sunny skies and verdant meadows, of shady forests and murmuring brooks, is gradually beaming like a smile on the face of nature. It is curious and delightful to trace the sweet and silent changes in every thing around us, as the stupendous orb upon which we insignificant mortals are treading, like so many atoms in pursuance of our little worthless schemes, turns its northern hemisphere more broadly towards the sun, in obedience to the wise plan of the universe. Among the crowds who shuffle carelessly by each other in this great metropolis, is there one whose heart is so chilled by the "infinite doings of the world" as not to greet the approach of spring with warm and kindly emotions? The stormy vapours which have hung about the vault of heaven, like the funeral drapery of some lofty hall, have passed away with the gloomy tempests engendered in their bosoms; verdure is stealing over the graceful branches of the willow, painting the road side with touches of green, and spreading a carpet for poets over the broad and undulated fields; and you may note from the brown coarse earth, and through the naked bushes, sprinklings of flowers, and tender buds, struggling and swelling into the wonders of life, fragrance, and exquisite beauty. I do not say that winter is an unpleasant season. I regard it as a rough, but honest friend, who, like many a man under a rugged and severe exterior, covers a mild and courteous spirit, a generous and faithful heart; but spring is a lovely and affectionate being of the gentler sex, who captivates by the sweetness of her temper, and the grace of her manners, and enchains the attention of the beholder by the fascinations of her beauty.

As my reveries wandered over these agreeable subjects, the Little Genius touched me on the shoulder with his wand, and pointed to the mirror with one of the very sweetest smiles in the world.

There stood a forlorn wretch before the court of sessions—rents were in his garments, and squalid misery on his face. Beside him sat his wife, of neat and prepossessing appearance, with grief and shame strongly depicted in her countenance, and his child held its mother's hand, and looked up at him awe-struck, but unconscious how, through the instrumentality of her father, her future years must be darkened with wretchedness and disgrace. The watchful officers of justice had detected him in keeping a gambling-house, and the grand jury had found a bill of indictment against him; one of the gentlemen, a sleek, well-fed, and contented individual, sat near, and cast upon him a frown of reprobation, whispering to his companion,

"He is a gambler, and he induces others to gamble. Monstrous depravity! Horrible malefactor! We cannot estimate the pernicious consequences of suffering such a criminal to prowl loose around society."

After a brief and impressive address from the judge, where-in the guilty nature of his offence was distinctly laid down, the trembling and degraded wretch was sentenced to prison. The horror-struck wife cast up her eyes in anguish, as if praying for support from heaven under her heavy load of sorrow; and when the spectators had eyed the felon with pity, contempt, and derision, according to their respective dispositions, he was attended by an officer to his cheerless abode, an outcast from men.

"Now mark," said the Genius.

I beheld the interior of the capitol at Albany during the session of the legislature. A worthy orator rose with a bill, which was received by that body of sage statesmen, according to their usual method of transacting business. An eloquent member made a speech upon the subject, which he intended should disguise his real motives under divers flourishes of rhetoric; but, by a droll freak of the Genius, instead of uttering what he wished, his language took a different turn.

"I have been urgently requested," said he, "by many of the most respectable individuals in the city of New-York, to endeavor to get this bill through the legislature as silently as possible. You see we can't live without money, and if this scheme shall be successful, it will be a lucky affair for us all. It would be very agreeable for us to have a legal right to take possession of whatever property we please, and to pay for it what we please. You see, Mr. Speaker, only give us the privileges we ask before the people take the alarm; for they might, perhaps, deprecate the construction of the road, from principles of convenience and safety; and, in order to complete our speculation, we can cut right through whatever buildings we please, in any direction we think proper. Why, sir, only think. We can take Broadway, if we wish, no matter whether the land is owned by private individuals or by the public, and straightway it will become our own. If any impertinent person; any poor families who have made investments in the land; any married women, guardians, or others, should prefer to retain their property, we will get persons to settle the affair to our satisfaction. Why, sir, it will be a perfect philosopher's stone. A few editors in the city may endeavour to make a fuss about it; but, believe me, sir," and he laid his hand on his heart, and his face assumed an expression of disinterestedness and sincerity, which instantly induced me to set him down as an honest and patriotic legislator, "believe me, sir, this 'talk about cutting through people's property is ridiculous.' The company don't intend to do any thing wrong." Just give them the privilege for only thirty years, and try them. We want all the power in our own hands; we wish the stock so divided as to give the whole direction of the affair to the commissioners; we wish to dispose of the rights of 'married women, idiots, minors, and the insane,' without the trouble of noticing their legal protectors; and it is requisite for our interests that all this authority should be lodged in the hands of men most deeply interested. As a conclusive argument, relative to the entire justice of such a proceeding, I can shut the lips of opposition by stating the simple fact, that our 'bill is drawn precisely like that for the Canajoharie rail-road.' It is very palpable, from what I have alleged, that whoever complains against us does so from 'personal motives,' and that I am animated only by an ardent and pure zeal to benefit my country."

The members, who had been busily occupied in writing political letters to their constituents, and in perusing the newspapers, declared that the bill was clearly for the good of the nation, and would form a permanent feature in our system of internal improvement. One patriot, who had branded Clinton as a traitor, because he promoted the grand canal, declared that the prosperity of his beloved country was the dearest wish of his bosom; that he had fought and bled in the cause of liberty; and that he gave his vote in favor of the bill partly from virtuous principles and partly because he should be a large stockholder. He turned out to be the very individual who had frowned upon the vagabond at the court of sessions, and had thought, in the meekness of his prosperity, "stand by, for I am holier than thou."

The glass next revealed our prosperous city, but strangely metamorphosed. A continued mass of splendid buildings had overspread the whole island. Instead of two, we had eight or ten hundred thousand inhabitants. I beheld Broadway in perspective, crowded with a dense population, when a speck, which appeared in the line of the horizon, gradually dilated as it approached into the form of a rail-road car, full of ladies and gentlemen. A beautiful boy had strayed from the side of his mother, and with a laugh of childish glee pointed to something which attracted his attention, when the machine ran over him with startling velocity, and left him lifeless upon the pavement, his golden tresses steeped in blood. In the fright of the moment, the man who managed the engine lost his presence of mind, and the party were precipitated into the street with fearful violence.

"Upon my soul," said a stockholder, who chanced to be passing in his barouche, and who had made a hundred thousand dollars out of the company, "this is rather an awkward business—but accidents will happen."

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE CIRCLE OF HUMAN WISHES.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

WHEN Horatio was a little boy at school he was always wishing himself a young man, "for then," thought he, "I shall not be obliged to be forever at my book, and live in constant fear of the schoolmaster."

When he became a young man he left school, with delightful anticipations of the freedom and pleasures he was about to enjoy. But from school he was placed in the office of a great lawyer, full of business, and from morning till night was employed in copying the same thing over and over again.

"I wonder," he often said to himself, "I wonder what is the use of telling the same story so often. I wish to heaven I was out of my time, and then I should be my own master."

At last his time was out. He passed examination, opened an office, and wrote esquire to his name. Here he would sit whole mornings, with his feet against the fender or jambs, waiting for clients—but no clients came.

"I wish to heaven," would he sigh to himself, "I had something to do."

In process of years he distinguished himself as a speaker, and business flowed in upon him, till he had hardly time to sleep or eat his meals.

"Zounds!" cried he, "one might as well be a galley-slave. I wish I were a little boy at school, they are so happy; no business to trouble them, and no cares on their minds."

But, as it was impossible to become a school-boy again, Horatio turned his thoughts towards the future, and began to wish he was rich enough to retire from business, and be a gentleman.

Years passed on, and at length he became rich; so rich that he thought he might leave off practice, and enjoy himself. Accordingly he did leave off practice, and for a little while it was delightful to have nothing to do, and go where he pleased. But doing nothing tires a man at last. It is the hardest work imaginable.

"I wish," said Horatio one day, as he was perplexing himself to death to know what he should do, "I wish I had something to employ me."

All at once he was seized with a desire to be a great man. As we advance in years the love of wealth often changes to the desire of power. He entered on the arena of politics, and his eloquence soon elevated him to distinction. He rose to the highest offices in the state, and at length saw nobody above him.

"Well," thought he, "I have it at last. I am the greatest among the great, and now I shall be able to enjoy myself. In the first place, I shall do just as I please."

At that moment his secretary came to announce a person on business.

"I am not inclined to see any body just now; tell him to call again."

"But, sir, it is a man of great consequence, and one of your best friends; he may be offended."

"Very well, let him come in."

The man of consequence entered, talked three whole hours about the politics of his district, and ended by soliciting an insignificant appointment, either for himself or somebody else.

"Well, said Horatio, 'thank heaven, he's gone. I'll go and take a ride into the country before dinner.'"

Just as he had ordered his horse, the secretary came to announce another person of consequence, who had very particular business, and whom it would be bad policy to offend. After a few wry faces from Horatio, he was let in.

The visitor being a knowing character, sat a long time, became very facetious, cracked jokes, told excellent stories, and when he had tired Horatio to death, thought he had brought him into a humor to do any thing he desired. Accordingly he begged his interest in behalf of the people he represented in favor of a great public improvement. Horatio had been specially instructed by divers old statesmen, to give good words if he could give nothing else. So he flattered him with good words, and the knowing gentleman went his way, chuckling at his happy knack of bringing great men into the humor of granting favors.

"I never met such a tiresome blockhead," quoth Horatio. "I'll make it a point to oppose his application."

It was too late to ride out before dinner, and he sat down to his meal without appetite, thinking he would have the afternoon to himself, at all events. By the time he had dined there were six people waiting to see him on particular business. It would not do to offend them, and besides he was the servant of the people. The particular business of each was to beg some particular favor. Horatio felt in an excellent humor for denying them all. But this would be impolitic; so he promised them all.

"What a tedious business!" said he. "But I shall have a comfortable evening, at all events."

In the evening visitors dropped in, one after another, until he had quite a levee. Every one tried to make himself particularly agreeable, for each had a favor to ask; and they talked so much that Horatio thought he had a swarm of bees in his ears. After he had yawned three times in the face of each of his visitors, and promised all they asked, they went away.

"I wish to heaven somebody would call one of these times, to give me something, instead of begging favors, as they all do; there would be a little variety in that."

He rung for his slippers, but the sound of his bell was drowned by a violent ring at the outer door. The porter announced a stranger.

"Tell him to call to-morrow—I'm just going to bed."

"He says he has most urgent business, and must see you to-night, sir."

"Despatches from abroad, I suppose; show him in."

The bearer of despatches entered, and after looking cautiously around, seeing that all the doors were shut, and that nobody was under the sofa, hemmed three times, and began,

"I beg pardon, sir, for this untimely visit, but I trust you will excuse me when you know the urgency of the occasion; I came, sir, to give you"—

"Heaven be praised," thought Horatio, "here is a man that has got something to give me at last."

"I took the liberty, sir, as a devoted friend to your administration, to call and give you some advice about the course proper to be pursued, in order to defeat a plot of the opposition, of which I have just been confidentially apprised."

"Sir," said Horatio, "I feel under infinite obligations; may I ask what it is?"

The adviser took till three in the morning to finish his communication and advice. Before he had ended Horatio was two-thirds asleep, but he waked in time to express his gratitude, and promised to bear in mind this signal proof of regard, in calling so late at night out of pure good will.

Day after day passed in these perpetual interruptions. Horatio had not a moment to spare, either for ease or exercise, and was tired to death.

"I wish to heaven," said he, "I was a private man, with nothing to do but just what I pleased. Ah! Mr. Mirvan, I am glad to see you. It is a delightful thing to receive a visit from one who wants nothing."

Mirvan was an old friend of Horatio, a rather eccentric person. Some people thought him wise, others a fool, for he seemed content with what he had, and what he was, though he was neither rich nor in power. He was a kind-hearted man, though he had not the reputation of it; for he was apt to make a jest of what other people thought very serious misfortunes, and seemed to take little interest in what are called the ups and downs of life.

After the first friendly salutations, Mirvan assumed the privilege of age and intimacy, and inquired how he liked his new situation.

"You neither look so well nor seem in such good spirits as when I used to see you in your office drawing pleas and declarations."

Horatio unboomed himself to his old friend. He detailed to him the progress of his wishes, from boyhood upwards—from the time he wished he was free from the labors and confinement of school, till he realized them all, step by step and became a great man, since when he had done little else than wish himself a school-boy again.

"It is the history of mankind," said Mirvan, after listening attentively; "and of all living things I believe if there be any truth in the fable—"

"What fable?" asked Horatio.

"I will tell you," replied the old man, his eye lighting up with arch intelligence; "will you promise to listen?"

"Provided you neither ask a favor nor give advice," said the other. "I have had enough of both lately."

"Agreed. Once upon a time a certain atom which shared a portion of that spirit of intelligence which animates, or at least in those days did animate all nature, being trod upon by a little insect, that has never been of sufficient consequence to be christened in English or Latin, exclaimed against his hard fate in being thus at the mercy of every creeping thing."

"If I were but an insect!" cried he, and the spirit of discontent possessed him from that moment. "O, Jupiter Ammon, Jupiter Ammon," he repeated, "wouldst thou but change me into an insect, if it were but as big as that which just now insulted me, I could then get out of the way of danger."

"Jupiter, whom nothing escaped, laughed ready to die at hearing this request, which he granted in a fit of good-humor. The little atom was as proud as a peacock, and strutted about with great dignity until it chanced that he encountered an ant, which walked right over him without ceremony, either accidentally or by design."

"O, Jupiter Ammon!" exclaimed the little insect without a name, "what a thing it is to be so small that nobody can see you! Would I were an ant, and then nobody would dare to insult me."

"Again Jupiter laughed and granted his request. The little ant strutted about, who but he! prouder than ever, and flattered himself he was somebody."

"It is worth while to live thus with the eyes of the universe upon us," cried he, when just at that instant a great wasp darted at him, and he narrowly escaped by running into his hole."

"Body o' me," exclaimed he, panting with rage and fear; "body o' me! what a misery it is to be nothing but an ant. If I were only a wasp now I should be somebody. O, Jupiter Ammon, would I were a wasp?"

"Jupiter, as usual, granted his prayer, for he began to be highly amused with his little atom."

"The wasp frisked his great tail and admired his little waist, just like a fashionable fine lady, until one day, not minding what he was about, he got entangled in a large spider web, where he remained struggling while the spider sat trembling with eagerness, waiting till he should exhaust himself by his efforts, to pounce upon him. At length, supposing the moment arrived, he darted towards him, just as he made a last desperate effort and escaped the toils."

"Truly a pleasant sort of life this," quoth the wasp, "to be forever in danger of being caught and eaten up by spiders. O, Jupiter Ammon, if I could only be a beautiful speckled spider!" and a spider he became from that moment.

"Mercy upon us what a big creature was he, and what havoc he made among the wasps and flies, till a great moth, blundering his way in the twilight, bolted right through his fine web, as big round as a cart-wheel, dotted with imprisoned flies, and not only carried all away, but put the spider's life in jeopardy."

"Fire and fury!" exclaimed he, "here is a month's provisions and an age's toil all swept away in a moment. O, Jupiter Ammon! make me a great moth, I beseech thee." No sooner said than done, and a moth was he.

"Nothing was ever so happy as our new made moth. He flew from flower to flower, tasted their sweets, gambled whithersoever he pleased, till one night seeing a candle, in an open window, he became enamored of its splendor, and rushing towards it so singed his wings and burned his body that he lay in the greatest agony."

"I am dying—O! Jupiter Ammon! make me an atom again," and he perished with this humble request on his lips.

"And now for the moral of my story," said Mirvan.

"I comprehend," said Horatio; "my own experience furnishes it. From an atom I have become a moth, flitting about the candle, and every moment in danger of scorching my wings and falling to the ground. But suppose the moth had become an eagle, and king of all the birds?"

"He would have only the more bitterly experienced the folly of being discontented with his former state, and sighed for the ease and insignificance of an atom."

"But suppose he had become an atom again?"

"Then he would have longed to become an eagle once more. And thus ends the circle of human wishes." B.

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

BOSTON, March 31, 1831.

ABOUT the year 1630 there lived in a small cottage on the south side of Charles river one William Blackstone, the first Englishman who had slept on this peninsula. The spot which he occupied was on a point near the western side of the place which the Indians called Shawmut, and the Englishmen on the opposite banks Trimountain. In the month of September, 1830, just two centuries afterwards, there was a grand celebration on this same peninsula, with an eloquent oration and beautiful poem, which might have been listened to by some sixty thousand individuals, if the church had been large enough to hold them. But what would Mr. William Blackstone have thought to have returned and joined in the ceremonies on that occasion? This, however, is only saying, that two centuries may work wonders; and when, at the same distance from this date, some future correspondent of the Mirror shall take up the matter at the point where I leave it, he may perhaps exclaim of Mr. Peregrine George as Mr. Peregrine George has now written of Mr. William Blackstone!

The first change effected by the settlers who followed Mr. Blackstone was in the unimportant item of a name; and the reason that I now date from Boston is the circumstance that the good people were desirous of paying a compliment to the minister, whose arrival they were every day expecting, and christened their new settlement after the place of his former labors. One of our historians ingeniously makes the Indian name of our peninsula signify living fountains, for which it is said to be still remarkable. The meaning of Trimountain can be immediately inferred from its etymology. Rome was on seven hills, and Boston is on three.

If I had anything to do with history, I would run on by the hour with details that any one with leisure and inclination may pick up from the musty manuscripts and printed annals he may find in relation to the settlers and inhabitants of Boston. But I am only of the present, and for the present, and have nothing to do with the dead, as the dead have nothing to do with me; on the same principle that a sect of Chinese philosophers inculcate upon their disciples to do nothing for posterity, as posterity has done nothing for them.

All this is merely to signify that my readers may be assured of my real object in the series of letters of which the first one at least may fall under their consideration. It is to catch the living manners, and to discourse of passing events; with no looking back, no looking forward, no history nor prophecy, no past nor future. It is centred in that small but expressive word present. A little chit-chat, a little scandal, a little narrative that is too true to be scandal and too grave to be chit-chat, though not grave enough to be dull, nor so true as to be offensive, is all that I can promise, though I hope not more than it will be in my power to perform. I shall talk a little of the drama, not boasting of any great skill or practice in theatrical criticism; not pretending to be a constant and habitual attendant upon its ceremonies, and openly confessing that I have never been initiated into the many mysteries of the green-room. I shall tell you something of our painters and paintings, though I have never handled a pencil nor daubed a canvass, since the day I first received the very respectable cognomen that is still attached to my person. I shall say a little of one or two of our eloquent divines, with no sectarian prejudices or partialities essentially to bias my opinions. I may have a word for our statesmen and lawyers, without overloading any of them with flattery or abuse; with a syllable, in short, for whatever is going on in the great world by which I am surrounded, whether of fashion, literature, law, politics, or religion.

And now if I have not chalked out in the preceding paragraph work for a twelvemonth, you must entertain the most singular ideas of man's capabilities. Driving, however, something of a rapid quill, I hope to live and make some progress towards its completion; and if you find me somewhat agreeable, we may continue for a considerable period the mutual civilities of writing and reading. Bear with me at starting, my gentle readers, that nothing would please me more, than to be able to impart the slightest pleasure to you.

My name I have incidentally mentioned above. This self-introduction is an awkward business, but we will exchange cards, my dear public, and then that part of it will be happily over. Here is my own—Peregrine George—in that modest letter, which is alike honored and conferring honor, as it peeps out from its more dashing companions in the rack of many a fair lady of the metropolis. You remember the explanation Dr. Franklin gave to the innkeeper of his whereabouts, and though you have grown more polite than you were in the doctor's time, you are still quite as inquisitive. Wishing, consequently, to gratify any reasonable curiosity you may entertain in respect to the author of the unpublished, and as yet unwritten, letters from Boston, a short personal history shall be laid before you.

Mr. Peregrine George is about five and twenty years of age, with no property, and small expectations. You would not select him from a crowd as particularly ugly, though there are a good many better looking men this side of the nearest planet. He is plausible in his manners, though a little reserved, and a person you would not go many miles out of your way to see, on a slight acquaintance. He is a bachelor, though not at all nervous; can pass an hotel without going into it, or have a bottle of wine on his table without drinking it; at the same time, he occasionally dines at a public-house, and is fond of a good goblet of the juice of the grape. He is not a man of the world nor a man of solitude, a student nor a bon-vivant. He haunts neither the public streets nor private libraries; never purchases unreadable books, nor dead insects, nor ancient coins, nor stuffed animals, nor medals from Rome, nor old paintings by new artists, partly because he has no gold to throw away, and partly because he is neither by taste nor education an antiquary or virtuoso. He patronizes poetry under the idea that he has an eye and an ear for it; and praises music though he is aware that he has no organ framed for its perfect enjoyment. In fine, he has nearly exhausted every thing that can be said even on the copious subject of self, and will leave the rest to your own tact at understanding character, when he has introduced himself to your better acquaintance.

I have but little time left to speak of the passing condition of our goodly city. Every winter we have a small body of about five hundred statesmen from the different corners of our commonwealth, snugly accommodated in a spacious building, to talk some three months about matters that very few of them understand, and pass laws, for whose passage very few comprehend the reasons:

"We late have missed them from their usual walk,
Nor in the church, nor at the bar are they;
Spring has clipped short their everlasting talk,
And from their councils hurried them away!"

The amount of the matter is, that it is high time they should be looking to their peas and potatoes, after a fine visit to Boston at the public expense. Our sun is, consequently, quite shorn of its beams. The theatre has been closed for the last three weeks, and the house of representatives has adjourned. Conceive of our quiet, nay, our desolate situation! P. G.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

O Messrs. Editors! Messrs. Editors—I am the most unfortunate woman in the world—undone—broken-hearted!—I wanted to be fashionable, like other people, and so I walked out every day in Broadway arm-in-arm with a distinguished foreigner, whose face they say is very handsome, only you can't see it for his whiskers. If you'll believe me, I meant no harm by it in the world, I only followed the fashion. Well, all at once a report was spread that I was going to be married to him, only because we walked arm-in-arm in the day! There was not a word of truth in the story, for you must know I was engaged to be married to a young man who had gone a voyage to Canton. Somehow or other the story got to his ears, and—and—he broke off the match. O that ever I was born! He wrote me the most unfeeling letter, saying that he had no ambition to receive the hand of a lady who gave her arm to every puppy she happened to meet. The distinguished foreigner has run away in debt to his landlord, and now I've got no lover at all. I've a good mind to make my papa sue the faithless young man who deserted me, for a breach of promise. Don't you think a young lady has a right to take anybody's arm she pleases, especially now it is the fashion among all the show-women? Adieu, forever! FELICIA S. P. S. Hadn't I better make away with myself? F. S.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—The other night I had the misfortune to lose a sober character, which has been in possession of my family for three generations. I believe it was dropped at a fashionable hotel, where I have been lately accustomed to spend my evenings. Should the finder see this notice, I hope he will return it, as my wife and children take on mightily. Your humble servant,

AMOS VAN BIBBER.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—Understanding that your paper has an extensive circulation, I am induced to request you will publish this letter for the benefit of your readers as well as the world at large. It has been the business of my life to devise plans for the comfort of my fellow-creatures, and I have the consolation of knowing that I have not laboured in vain. That you and the public may judge for yourselves, I will detail a few of my projects, together with some of the advantages which may reasonably be expected to result from them.

My first plan is the establishment of a bank for saving all the time and money wasted by the good people of this city in idleness, extravagance, and dissipation. Each person might deposit his spare minutes and money from time to time, so that in the course of a few years he could hardly fail of having a snug capital of both, which, if properly husbanded, would go near to ensure a comfortable old age. I think it is not to be doubted that such an institution, if properly managed, would annihilate poverty altogether, and render the poor quite independent of charity. Don't you think the legislature will grant me a charter? My bank would be a capital place to deposit some of the time spent in long speeches.

My next is a plan for ameliorating the condition of all sorts of criminals; first, by permitting the laborers in the state prisons, as well as those condemned to be hanged, to hire substitutes; and secondly to provide those who cannot do this with handsome marble palaces, comfortable lodgings, and such a judicious selection of the little comforts and luxuries of life as will go far to diminish their regrets at being shut out from the enjoyment of the sweets of liberty. I flatter myself every friend to humanity will aid me in the accomplishment of this philanthropic plan.

But what I value myself most upon is the invention of a man-machine, which exercises all the useful functions, and performs all the ordinary duties of a rational being. I have not been able to satisfy myself whether it actually thinks and reasons, but I don't hold this material to the perfection of my man; as it is my own private opinion that thinking and reasoning are great sources of waste of time and human misery. I am not sure either that I can make a professor, a philosopher, or poet of my man; but for auctioneers, criers of all kinds, second-rate actors, dandies, and people who repeat over the same thing every day, I am confident he will prove a most efficient substitute. As he neither eats nor drinks, his wages will be next to nothing, and it may be conceived what a vast saving will result from the employment of men-machines in the ordinary duties of life, particularly where reasoning and thinking are only a dead loss of time.

The principal objection to my plan is that it will throw a great many men, constructed of the old materials, entirely out of employment. But then you know they can go upon the parish, which is all such people seem to be made for now-a-days in other countries. I don't think it will be long before these old fashioned fellows will be exploded entirely, and come to be defined, not as animals with two legs and no feathers, but as animals created for the sole purpose of living on charity.

I have several more plans on the anvil, which I may communicate when I have brought them to perfection. In the mean time, I am, &c.

PHIL. ANTHROPY.

P. S. I have recommendations from some of the first men in this country in behalf of all my plans and inventions. P. A.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Thoughts on the original Unity of the Human race. By Charles Caldwell, M.D. New-York. E. Bliss. 12mo. pp. 178. 1830.

It is delightful to call to mind the sublime events of history. Truth must always be more grateful to the understanding than fiction. Upon this principle of human nature we account for the gratification with which we recollect the renowned conflict between the two Kilkenny cats, wherein, as the most voracious writers affirm, "they did eat each other entirely up, not even leaving the end of a tail!" We were forcibly reminded of this incident by a perusal of the "Thoughts on the original Unity of the Human race," which appears to be a pretty severe fight between two sons of Æsculapius for the honor of informing the worthy people of the globe exactly how they came to be where they are.

Dr. Pritchard commenced the important investigation by a work entitled "Researches into the physical history of man," the second edition of which was issued in London, 1826. Upon these unfortunate "Researches," Charles Caldwell, M.D. pounces with the eagerness of a hawk upon a sparrow, and whatever may be the ideas of the public, he makes no secret of his own opinion, that he has, as some modern colloquist classically expressed himself, "knocked his opponent into the middle of next week."

The unmerciful handling which the doctor bestows upon his professional brother, is rendered yet more amusing by the mingled air of respect and self-satisfaction with which he plants his blows. He lavishes a profusion of laudatory sentiments upon his victim. We have continually applied to him, "It is difficult to conceive how his attainments, in that branch of knowledge, can be improved!"—"they seem to be as complete as research and accessible records can render them!"—"ornamented the whole with his classical learning," and "intellect of no common order." But then, of his views, "We think they constitute a tissue as purely hypothetical, as any connected with physical science. They are not surpassed by Whiston's dream of cosmogony, Buffon's theory of generation, or the more modern visions of consecutive spheres."

The object of Dr. Pritchard was to establish on philosophical grounds the doctrine, that the whole human race descended from a single pair. Being a point rather difficult of mathematical demonstration, the learned inquirer is driven into a course of analogical reasoning, and his attention is first directed to the vegetable kingdom. He contends that of every species of vegetable a single male and female were at first created and planted in a spot where soil, climate, and exposure, and all other circumstances were most favorable to their growth and propagation. Each continent was furnished at the beginning with its own aboriginal plants. The seeds of these vegetables, he supposes, were conveyed to the requisite distances by means of birds, animals, winds, rivers, land streams, and oceanic currents. The inference is, that if vegetables have been so created, it is not improbable that the human species had a similar origin. Without commenting on the unceremonious manner in which the "lord of the creation" is shuffled off by the hand of philosophy among potatoes, turnips, and oak trees, the reviewer attacks him with a tolerable display of rebutting evidence. It is very true that the places where oak, hickory, walnut, and chestnut trees grow, are not only not washed by streams of water, but are rarely in the neighborhood of them; neither could the large and heavy seeds of the plants, from their specific gravity, have been diffused by wind any more than by water, and such animals as feed on acorns, &c. break their shells and masticate and devour them, as they would any other nutriment. The conclusion of Dr. Caldwell is, that the various forms of vegetable life were the result of a spontaneous growth, and that were the whole vegetable kingdom, stalks, seeds, and roots, to be destroyed, the earth would reproduce them. He here quotes several interesting facts.

"From almost any portion of uncultivated ground in the United States, remove the forest timber and the undergrowth that have covered it for ages, and, in a short time, a crop of different vegetables will spring up. Nor will they be the vegetables of the neighborhood, but such as are found only in remote places. Shall we be told that the seeds or roots of the new plants had lain long buried and dormant in the ground, and vegetate now because hindrances are removed, and circumstances rendered favorable? We reply, that this is conjecture, and add, that it is exceedingly improbable. By no strictness of search can such seeds or roots be detected. The attempt has been made, and has uniformly failed. Not a germ of the strange growth has been discovered in the soil."

And again: "In New-Jersey, the Carolinas, and elsewhere, the following phenomena have been repeatedly observed. Cultivate, until you impoverish it, a tract of land, whose original native growth was oak and hickory. Cease to cultivate it, and it will produce, in a few years, a crop of pine. Suffer this to grow for fifteen or twenty years, until, by the falling and decomposition of leaves, branches, and bark, and the decaying of herbs and grass, the soil shall be again enriched. Fell and remove the pine, and oak and hickory will be again produced. Further. In the same states, cut down a pine forest, that has occupied the ground for ages, and the succeeding growth will be oak and hickory. In New-Jersey, several flourishing nurseries of young oaks, produced in this way, exist at present, in the centre of extensive forests of pine. Nor, we repeat, can the severest scrutiny detect, in the soil, either pine seeds in the one case, or acorns or hickory-nuts in the other. Are we asked the cause of these changes of vegetable productions? The answer seems easy. In the places specified, pine is the native growth of a poor sandy soil; and oak and hickory, of the same sort, when somewhat enriched by the dissolution of vegetable matter. Impoverish the soil, therefore, where oak and hickory have grown, and you fit it for pine. Fertilize that which has produced pine, and you adapt it to the production of oak and hickory."

Dr. Pritchard then summons to his assistance the results of a vast deal of scientific observation, in order to prove that the human race, having originally sprung from one pair, have branched out into the various species which now exist, and that the great difference between them has been the result of physical causes. Dr. Caldwell replies no. If climate, situation, food, &c. can change men as they do hogs, poultry, turkeys, oxen, and horses, why have they not done it within the memory of man?

The colony of Jews, which migrated to the coast of Malabar seventeen hundred years ago, settled among a people whose complexion is black; but their own resemblance to the European Jews remains almost undiminished.

Dr. Caldwell now loses his patience at the provoking hypothesis of Dr. Pritchard, and breaks out into the following strain:

"The mode of reasoning resorted to, if it deserves the name of reasoning, is not only fallacious, but dangerous in its tendency. It is sliding gradually into error, as men slide into vice. Neither the physical nor the moral temper blows in full force at first. The freshening breeze admonishes of the coming storm. Individuals do not perpetrate, as a first offence, either arson or murder. Of intellectual deviations, the same is true. Men rarely plunge at once into the depth of error. They are reduced, step by step, unconscious of danger, until the flood overwhelms them.

"The hazard attendant on the supposed mutation we are considering, arises from its having no stopping place. If man can be changed from a Caucasian, first into a Mongolian, a Malay, or an American Indian, and then into a negro, he may pass next to a Bosheseman, by another step into a golo, and again into something still lower. Each successive change is alike easy, and alike probable. By such a process there will be no difficulty in changing horses into asses, zebras, or quages; common black cattle into buffaloes, wolves into dogs, one species of the cat kind into another, eagles into hawks, geese into ducks, and grouse into partridges. Nor is it of the least moment whether these changes are produced by the influence of climate—the result will be the same. By an irregular generative process, the Caucasian race produces the Mongolian; by an irregularity no greater, produces the Malay, the Malay the common African, that the Bosheseman or the Papuan, that the orang-outang, that the baboon, that the monkey, and that something else; and still the last and most degraded belongs, like the first, to the family of man!"

It is very evident that Charles Caldwell, M. D. has no idea of being made out either an ass or a monkey.

We have not embodied all the weighty arguments advanced on both sides of the question, as the subject will not excite the curiosity and zeal of our readers as it has aroused that of the two conflicting doctors. In our opinion the question is left pretty much in statu quo. We entered upon a perusal of the volume with a shrewd presentiment that neither of the erudite gentlemen knew any thing about the matter, and our suspicion has been now confirmed into a certainty. Indeed, as we grow older, we are accustomed to take it for granted, that whoever advances any thing upon similar subjects, with the slightest degree of dogmatism, is either a great deal wiser than other people or not quite so wise.

An Essay on the Disorders and Treatment of the Teeth. By Eleazar Parmly, Dentist. Third edition. 12mo. pp. 62. London. T. & G. Underwood. 1821.

Among the vast number of publications which, during the last ten years, have issued from the press, few have a more direct bearing upon the happiness of mankind than this modest and useful treatise. It seems to have really sprung rather from philanthropy than interest, and sets forth without any parade of language, and with perfect simplicity, the actual causes of that most exquisite of agonies, the toothache, and a few clear and concise directions respecting its prevention and cure. They are valuable guides to parents and to others entrusted with the care of children. In this country the art of dentistry has been much in the hands of charlatans, to the great prejudice of the profession, and the incalculable injury of those who have suffered from unskillful or injudicious operations. From the very respectable individuals to whom Mr. Parmly refers, among whom are Dr. Baillie, Sir Astley Cooper, and Sir Anthony Carlisle, the two latter, at the time of the publication of this book, surgeons to the late king of England, those unacquainted with his continual success in his profession will be induced to place the greatest confidence in his advice.

The almost universal prevalence of disorders of the teeth is to be ascribed principally to inattention, not to nature. Those parts of the human structure are created of the hardest and most durable materials, as is evident from the fact that after interment they are found in a state of perfect preservation when all the other bones have mouldered away. They are equally important as organs of speech and of mastication, and in regard to personal appearance, our author very well observes that their irregularity or loss is betrayed by a corresponding change in the symmetry and character of the face. It has also been proven that the general health of the body is affected by the influence which diseased or unclean teeth exercise upon the stomach and lungs. The dentition of the first set, which generally protrude about the sixth or eighth month, is a most critical period in the life of a child, and the consequent mortality has been ascertained to be great. At this crisis the jaws of the infant are in a state of pain and irritation, and instead of some hard substance to rub them on, Mr. Parmly recommends a gentle friction with the finger and the application of a little fine salt.

"Scarification, however," he continues, "appears to be the safest expedient that can be had recourse to. This is performed by the point of a lancet being pressed down upon the tooth until the gum and investing membrane be fully divided. The pressure being by this means taken off, the child will experience instantaneous relief. Parents should be cautious how they give way to any vulgar prejudice against an operation by which many have been freed from the most dangerous symptoms."

He reprobates the use of the anodynes generally resorted to by sufferers, which afford only a temporary relief by the sacrifice of the surrounding teeth. Yet in cases when an individual in pain is not enabled to have immediate recourse to a dentist, he designates a strong solution of camphor in spirits of wine, which, if not entirely a specific, may be used with much more safety than most of the celebrated remedies. These, as is also the case with many of the powders and tinctures used to whiten the enamel, are eventually injurious.

As there are few families of which some members are not occasionally afflicted with the tortures arising from carious teeth, and as numerous advertisements in the public prints tempt the patient to various ineffectual means of relief, and among others that of destroying the nerves, we deem the following extract deserving careful attention.

"The success of attempts at destroying the nerves of teeth is far more limited than is generally imagined; and I wish it particularly to be borne in mind that I approve of the practice only in a limited way. In a front tooth the nerve is most commonly destroyed by a single operation, because the fang is single, and has the advantage of being more perpendicular than in a tooth with divaricating fangs. But it is an erroneous idea that a diseased tooth, if it has more than a single fang, may be rendered useful and free from pain by destroying its nerves. The practice has only served to expose the emptiness of the theory, since most of those who have undergone the operation, which can be termed little less than martyrdom, have barely found that they have been made to forget the usual pain of toothache in the unutterable agony of the operation. But this is not all the objection; for where the operator is so fortunate as partially to destroy the nerves of double teeth, and even this is very rarely the case, the membranes are apt to become diseased by inflammatory action, and the tooth requires to be extracted in a very short time afterwards. It cannot, therefore, be too strongly urged, that where a double tooth is painful, and has become so much decayed as not to be capable of being saved by the operation of stopping, it should, in order to prevent all unpleasant consequences, be extracted immediately. In evidence of the fallacy of the attempt at destroying the nerves of back teeth, I shall adduce a single instance which came under my own observation.

"A gentleman possessing highly organized teeth, having twice suffered very serious lacerations of the bone from extraction, and having even been threatened with lock-jaw, submitted to have the fangs of the first lower molars, which had long been a source of torture, drilled, with the hope of thus eradicating its nerves. The operation, after excruciating agonies, proved within a few hours to have been useless; the cavity of the tooth was then filled with a compound metallic stopping, but the pain returned with such violence that it was necessary to remove it. The patient continued during many months to make every application and adopt every measure which the most experienced medical practitioners could suggest, but in vain. His protracted sufferings brought on a low fever, accompanied by frequent delirium. Efforts were again and again made at extraction; but at the first touch of an instrument, the patient was always seized with convulsions, and the operation could not be effected. Having thus lingered on for six months, the tooth was fortunately extracted during a period of insensibility, the result of intense suffering; but, although the expected local relief was thus obtained, several months elapsed before he regained his former health and vigor. The tooth was examined after extraction, when it appeared that very trifling portions of nerve had been destroyed; that one fang contained a large and vigorous nerve, sending off five branches at its point; the other fang a large nerve equally unaltered, sending off six branches around its point."

We attach to this subject more importance than it generally obtains. The toothache, while it is one of the most agonizing tortures "which flesh is heir to," is generally regarded with little or no sympathy from a mistaken idea that it produces no permanent evil consequences. "It is, however," says our essayist, "sometimes so severe as to produce alarming derangements of health." We have urged this treatise upon the notice of our readers from a wish to stimulate every one to a strict attention to the methods of preventing the disorder, or to arrest it in its early stages, and particularly to remind every parent of the painful results to their children of neglect on their part.

The last number of this popular work is of more than ordinary interest. It contains a fine article, entitled "Lord Byron's mode of living in Italy," which is too long to extract. We select the following amusing letter, as a warning to young ladies who resort to cosmetics instead of early rising, air, and exercise:

"A most unfortunate accident has induced me to apply to you, gentlemen, for advice. You must know that my sister Matilda, whose complexion is somewhat decayed, had got hold of a book called 'Medea's Kettle,' or the art of restoring decayed beauty, which contains, among other receipts, one for an infallible cosmetic, calculated to produce a most beautiful complexion. This we mixed up, and I am sure put every thing in that was directed, and proceeded exactly as the book prescribed. When it was ready, I spread it on my sister's face when she went to bed. But there must have been some sad mistake somewhere; for on hastening to her room in the morning to witness the effects of our experiment, what do you think I beheld? Her whole face was of a bright sky blue color! Only think how shocking—how mortifying—I thought I should have dropped, though I could not help laughing, my sister looked so conical. As for Matilda, she would certainly have gone out of her senses had I not assured her that her face would undoubtedly be restored to its former color by washing it with soap and water. This we tried and tried again—warm water we tried, scalding water we tried, but poor Matilda's face remained just the same—bright sky blue. We were now upon the point of giving up any further attempts, when the laundress proposed trying some stuff, muriatic acid, I think she called it, that she was in the habit of employing to remove stains from linen. This we accordingly did; and I do think we should have succeeded, but that the acid was of a yellowish hue, and mixing with the blue stain upon the face, produced a delicate pea-green. This is my poor sister's present color, and thus, for all I know, it will remain. We intend trying scalding water again, and you shall have an early account of the next boiling—but in the mean time, for goodness' sake, do, gentlemen, you who are so completely versed in all that relates to the human constitution, give us your advice and assistance. For my part, I am almost afraid of applying the hot water, lest we may only change the complexion of my sister to some more hideous hue. This I should be sorry to do, as I have rather a fancy for pea-green. This you know might certainly be the case. Lobsters, you are aware, change color when boiled, and so do lilac ribbons. This is an idea of my own—but I hear my sister call, and as I can do nothing but console her with hopes that you may point out some means for restoring her natural complexion, I have only time to subscribe myself yours, &c. ELLEN."

The foregoing reminds us of a circumstance which occurred a short time since in this city. A gentleman, with a full flowing head of fiery red hair, procured some patent panacea, which the advertisement informed him would change its color to a beautiful glossy jet black. For several days the experiment was perfectly successful, and our hero flourished through the streets, on excellent terms with himself, and the "observed of all observers;" when, one afternoon, at a dinner-party, as he cast a self-satisfied glance into the looking-glass, what was his horror on beholding that his black tresses, whiskers and all, reflected an animated purple color! Pleading sudden indisposition, he hastily adjourned to his barber's, and was shorn of his locks, which are now more red than ever.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Harlaem Rail-road.—Without the slightest personal interest in the sudden attempt to inflict a rail-road upon this city, before the subject has been properly understood by the community, we are constrained to express our opinion that such a measure would be unnecessary, impolitic, and unsafe. It would, undoubtedly, prove a lucrative business to the stockholders, but not without a sacrifice of public convenience. We should regret to interfere with the private plans of any gentlemen, or to be the means of circulating unfounded imputations; but it is very certain that this bill has passed the assembly before the people were acquainted with the merits of the question; and that it contains features as extraordinary in their nature as the means by which they have so nearly been hurried into a law. We protest against these legal speculations. It is a danger to which our form of government is peculiarly exposed, and from which we are to be guarded only by the watchfulness and independence of the public press. It is truly observed by a contemporary journal, that the enterprise should not be opposed from personal motives; but it is equally unjust that personal motives should induce individuals to support a measure contrary to the wishes, or at least unsanctioned by the approbation of the majority of the citizens, and which is incompatible with the safety of our dense and rapidly increasing population. If, however, such a project should be deemed necessary, we prefer to see it as much separated from the pecuniary interests of private persons as would be consistent with its success. Its sole aim should be the public good; and those engaged in executing it should be paid only in proportion to the time, talents, and knowledge used in effecting it. The application for a charter of thirty years' duration proves the exorbitant expectations of the projectors. We believe the value of a proportion of the property on the island would be materially enhanced, and the holders, of course, would be the gainers; but what shall be said to a citizen forcibly deprived of his lots, without any reference to their future value? Shall one man be permitted to say to another, "I will take your house and grounds at my own price, in order to render mine more valuable?" It would be perplexing even for the accomplishment of some purpose of generally acknowledged utility, to satisfy such landholders as to any equitable standard of appraisal; but when the anticipated advantages are strictly of a local character, such an authority, lodged in the hands of interested individuals, is glaringly unjust, and should not be tolerated. Indeed we do not remember to have seen a bill so full of extensive privileges, speciously covered up under merely ostensible prohibitions, and attempted to be foisted upon the public, with so little regard to propriety and the wishes of the people, as this same act to incorporate the New-York and Harlaem rail-road company.

Editorial accessions.—The Evening Journal, which has heretofore been ably conducted by Mr. Joseph C. Hart, announces that Mr. S. H. Jenks will hereafter be associated with him in the editorship of that paper. Mr. Jenks is known as a writer of much force, and enters upon the great political arena as a knight of gallant bearing, who flings down his gauntlet to his enemies without any fear of breaking a lance with the best of them. A soul-stirring flourish of trumpets in the form of an address to his patrons, announces his arrival in the lists. We look for some brisk tilting. We perceive also that the forthcoming volume of the Euterpeid is to be under the direction of Mr. Horatio Gates, formerly editor of the Catskill Recorder. This musical journal will doubtless be much improved by the accession of his experience, taste, and talents. "Last, but not least," the Courier and Enquirer informs its readers that their old acquaintance, Mr. M. M. Noah, is once more enthroned in the elbow-chair of that establishment. No man is better calculated to sprinkle the pages of a daily journal with wit and humor. It is said there is a lively sensation among the fraternity, or (to use his own emphatic language) "a great skipping among the mice." The major is perfectly familiar with the affairs of the city, and knows all the labyrinths of politics by heart. With a singular proneness to fall into dilemmas, he possesses a fortunate faculty by which he extricates himself in a good-natured manner. He quarrels with everybody, and yet keeps them in a roar. With the politics of any of these gentlemen, however, we have nothing to do, but as a liberal critic and capital joker, a facetious and readable essayist, and a pleasant and ready writer, we welcome Mr. Noah back to his old duties.

Mr. Bulwer.—This fervid and popular author has not increased his reputation by his late attempt at poetry. He should have adhered to novel writing, "and then he had not broke his neck with climbing." The glowing ardor of his composition will always ensure him readers, eager to elevate him above his proper rank, and there is visible in the character of our public a strong propensity to exaggerate and overpraise. While several critics have placed him above Byron as a poet, and Scott as a novelist, the National Gazette contains the subjoined paragraph:

"Having looked into the satirical poem, the Siamese Twins, by the author of Pellham, we can aver that it is, on the whole, a wretched production. The greater part of it is trash, of which the sensible reader must feel ashamed, whatever may be the sentiments of the writer at any time. Judging from his preface, we may say that Bulwer entertains a high opinion of his muse. This is not the first time that a man of talents has egregiously mistaken his road to fame."

Cinderella.—An apology is due to M—t, for the delay of his spirited article on the subject of this opera. It shall appear, however, as soon as the pressure of other matter will permit. We have been overburthened of late with musical essays and critiques, mostly referring to the great attractions of Cinderella, which, we perceive, the managers have announced for repetition with new scenery, of a yet more splendid description. This, of course, will have its effect upon the public; although the delightful warblings of our prima donna do not need any additional aid to ensure the attendance and admiration of real lovers of music. It is but justice to add, as another claim possessed by this piece upon the attention of amateurs, that it has afforded Mr. Jones an opportunity of proving himself a vocalist of superior merit, and ranked him among the very best who have ever exerted themselves to delight an American audience.

Macdonough Jacksonian.—The politeness of a southern correspondent has furnished us with a file of the Macdonough Jacksonian, a literary periodical of great repute in the interior of the state of Georgia. The following interesting communication appears as the leading editorial article, in the last number:

"My absence to the late superior court of Walton county, some mechanical business unavoidably commanding my attention, and a violent rheumatic affection in one of my legs, have conspired to delay this gazette to this time."

The reader will probably recollect the fine burst of feeling in a celebrated tragedy, written in very chaste and choice poetry:

"Summon the physicians of the universe,
Bid them bring whole magazines of gallipotted nostrums,
Arranged in pharmaceutical order.
The man that cures our editor shall have our paper."

North American Review for April.—The articles of this number are "Origin and progress of the French language," "Foreign relations of Mexico," "Economy of Athens," "Character and abuses of the medical profession," "Waverley Novels," "British and American shipping," "The art of preserving beauty," "Memoirs of Oberlin," "Geology," "Imprisonment for debt," "The Water Witch," and "Bank of the United States." The papers of this fine journal are so temperately, and often eloquently written, and afford such clear and intelligent views of the state of literature and the arts, that it should be in the hands of every American reader.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—"It is a consummation devoutly to be wished" that there should exist some settled code by which controversy might be regulated, and which might be used as a sort of manual to enable people in the busy walks of life to decide promptly on the pretensions of conceited blunderers, and the whole tribe of obstinate and industrious Proteuses, with which literature is pestered. The public in general, especially in a mercantile community, have neither time nor inclination to follow a long-winded discussion through all its various windings and turnings; and as the age has passed "when if the brains were out the man would die," the fashion has come up in its stead, that when the legs of writers are cut off, they deem it necessary to enact the part of Widdrington, in the old ballad of "Chevy Chase," and fight upon their stumps.

"For Widdrington, I needs must mourn as one in doleful dumps,
Who, when his legs were smitten off, still fought upon the stumps."

It is in vain that in literary controversy you look for silence and prostration after defeat, as on the real field of battle. In the field of polemical warfare, wounds, however desperate, heal with the facility of those of Milton's angels, where some ethereal essence has only to be applied, and combatants who ought to be lying hors de combat, jump up again and move as briskly as do the mendicant tribe in London, about the hour of supper, who get rid of their fabulous fractures, sham sores, pretended palsies, and starving twin-children, with astonishing dexterity. The manœuvres of our heroes of the goose-quill are equally wonderful. They are gifted beyond the demigods in the Iliad or Ænied, who had at least some mortal points; and they have likewise all the wonderful instincts and defences which protect the brute race and finny tribes. Some of these facetious scribblers, in imitation of the hedgehog, should any danger approach, or should their adversary prove too potent, curl themselves up and present a round ball of prickly personalities; others, like a certain kind of fish when pursued, blacken the water all around them, so that they cast a mystification over the subject, and escape through the obscurity which they have purposely created. Some, like the hare, when hunted by a stanch pack of hounds, cross, double, and double again on their own track to throw their pursuers out. Others, like the sly fox, will take refuge in the very scene of their predatory attacks, the hen-roost—and one whom we have lately had occasion to handle, like the sow accursed in Shakspeare, has, in defence of itself, been convicted of devouring its nine farrow. Under these circumstances, Messrs. Editors, we have come to the determination that in future, although we shall ever be found ready to do our best to prostrate our opponents, yet that when we have fairly and manfully achieved the same, we shall deem it equally incumbent upon us to leave them to the full enjoyment of their terrestrial struggles.

I LOVE BUT THEE!

WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.—COMPOSED BY CIANCHETTINI.

Tenderly.

Dolce

If, af - ter all, you still will doubt and fear me, And think this heart to o - ther loves will stray; If I must swear, then, love-ly doubt-er, hear me, By ev' - ry dream I have when thou'rt away, By ev' - ry throb I feel when thou art near me, I love but thee! I love but thee!

2d—By those dark eyes, where light is ever playing,
Where Love, in depth of shadow, holds his throne,
And by those lips, which give whate'er thou'rt saying,
Or grave or gay, a music of their own,

A music far beyond all minstrel's playing,
I love but thee! I love but thee!
2d—By that fair brow, where Innocence reposes,
As pure as moonlight sleeping upon snow;

And by that cheek, whose fleeting blush announces
A hue too bright to bless this world below,
And only fit to dwell on Eden's roses,
I love but thee! I love but thee!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

SCRAPS FROM MY COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

NUMBER IX.

ANCIENT CUSTOMS OF THE COMMON PEOPLE.—The early emigrants to the United States were generally zealous admirers of simplicity in the administration of the rites of the church, and stanch enemies to every custom which they could trace to heathen origin. Hence almost all the little rural superstitious customs which survived the downfall of paganism, and still subsisted among the common people, were held by our ancestors to be either absurd or idolatrous, and gained no footing in this country.

Such has been the case with the affecting ceremony of strewing flowers over the graves of departed friends and dear relatives. This was a part of the funeral rites of the Romans, as we learn from Cicero, in his sixth oration for Lucius, and from the sixth Æneid of Virgil. It was adopted by the christians, and is still practised in some of the rural churches of England. Gay says—

"Upon her grave the rosemary they threw,
The daisy, butter-flower, and odive blue."

It is a custom as poetical as affecting, and I cannot help regretting its disuse in this country. It has nothing superstitious about it, and even the orthodox Henry Rouine, author of the Antiquitates Vulgares, who is the most intolerant in these matters, sees nothing in it to reprehend.

GENIUS.—The flights of genius are sometimes like those of a paper kite. While we are admiring its vast elevation, and gazing with boyish wonder at its graceful soarings, it plunges into the mud, an object of derision and contempt.

THE MILKY WAY.—It was the opinion of some of the ancient philosophers that the milky way was the road by which the inferior deities went to the councils of Jove. Others maintained it to be the path by which the souls of heroes winged their way to heaven, after the dissolution of their bodies.

PROSPERITY AND ADVERSITY.—The prosperous man has every thing to fear, and the poor man every thing to hope. To the former every change threatens loss, to the latter it promises benefit. He little fears the turning of the wheel who is already at the bottom.

HOW TO GET ALL YOU ASK.—Desire the women to take all you have and the men to give you nothing, and both will be sure to grant all you ask of them.

HOW TO BE ALWAYS WELCOME.—Give something wherever you go, and you will be sure of a good reception.

RECIPE TO BE RICH.—If you have money, keep it; if you have not, don't covet it, and you will be rich enough.

HOW TO CATCH A WOMAN.—If she walks, walk faster; if she walks faster, run; if she runs, fly, and you'll soon come up with her.

RECIPE FOR BEING UNIVERSALLY BELOVED.—Lend, and never ask to be paid; make presents, give treats, bear and forbear, do everybody a good turn, hold your peace, and suffer yourself to be cheated.

RECIPE FOR NEVER WEARING OUT CLOTHES.—Tear them to rags or give them away, and you need not fear their wearing out.

HOW TO PREVENT TAILORS FROM CABBAGING.—Let them make no clothes for you; that is the only remedy.

A POLITICIAN.—A fellow that turns his coat, because if he did not, he would soon have no coat to turn.

ALCHMY.—Your apothecary is your only alchymist, for he turns all sorts of trash into gold.

GRIEF AND BEER.

When the united powers of beef and beer
Had equal'd Tom to a fat stall-fed steer,
He lost his wife, and with a heavy sigh,
After his dinner, to a friend did cry,
"Alas! there's nothing blows one up like grief;"
"Nothing," replied his friend, "except roast beef." B

ergetic fulness of the chorus, indeed the whole arrangement is peculiarly expressive of the manner of Rossini, and may be considered a masterpiece. The second act has little music except a quartette of some beauty, and rather libellous sentiment against the fair sex, and a comic duet, wherein the vis comica superabundantly appears. Nor can we in justice to Placide forbear noticing his execution, or, we might more properly say, enactment of his part of the duet. The talents of this gentleman, though generally acknowledged, are not fully appreciated. His personification of ludicrous passion in aged characters is, beyond comparison, faithful. Of his French characters the public have ere this formed their opinion; indeed the versatility of his talents leaves few branches of the drama beyond his range, to prove which we have only to cite his Antonio, in the Marriage of Figaro. His enactment of the old baron is well worth seeing. While his pompous vanity is ridiculous and extremely amusing, there is a vein of almost impotent cruelty running through his disposition, which makes him contemptible. Lacy has reserved the chief splendor of Rossini for the last act, in which he opens such a treasure of music, that the senses are almost intoxicated. The duet commencing "Let thine eyes on mine mildly beaming," is a charming piece, and contains strains of surpassing beauty; but we think nothing can be more voluptuously splendid, if we may be allowed the expression, than the glee, variations and chorus, executed in the ball-room. Indeed the mind is exhilarated to such a degree, that one can scarcely conceive the whole to be an illusion; and her who charmingly administers to the refined senses any other than a seraphic vision. Though extremely difficult, the variations are given with an ease, facility, and effect to the excellence of which the plaudits of thousands have borne unequivocal testimony, and which are above description luxurious. We have witnessed this delightful opera nine times, and on each occasion the desire for the repetition of this piece of music could only be exceeded by the good-will with which the prima donna complies, and we have invariably noticed that in the repetition more fire and brilliancy are ever imparted. It is almost unnecessary to descend from the praises of this music to a notice of the remainder, consisting of an aria and chorus, finely expressive of the feelings of the Prince upon the disappearance of Cinderella—an excellent march and a finale, replete with characteristic beauty. We will conclude, therefore, with a cursory review of the corps operatic.

In his department, which is evidently that of a basso, Mr. Thorne is very respectable. He has some comic talent, and is well adapted to parts which contain music like that of Dandini. His lower tones are full and sonorous, and we are happy to find that he has rectified the mistake into which he at first fell, of attempting that of the tenori. "Let him reform it altogether."

T. Placide, having no music assigned him, comes not properly within the subject of this critique. Much having been said of his enactment of Pedro, we deem it within our province to give our trifling assent to its merits, though he rather "out-herods Herod." The true personification of Pedro is a difficult matter. He is a quiet young man, with no tricks, no far-fetched waggonery, no stage art; there is no assumption about him until he has been converted into a lord. It is a good character, and not wishing to underrate Mr. Placide, we should be pleased to see Mr. Barnes enact the part.

Mr. Ritchings performs the character assigned him very creditably, and we were pleased to find him in his forte, graceful and easy gesticulation.

Of Mr. Jones we are always gratified to speak. With regard to his musical taste and attainments we consider him unrivalled on our boards. His personal appearance in the young Prince is much improved. His clear distinct articulation and perfect intonation, (an unusual merit,) the melody of his voice, and his excellent management of it, give him a title to the first rank among vocalists.

The two sisters sustain themselves with much spirit in the persons of Mesdames Blake and Vernon, and their difficult music is executed very creditably.

Mrs. Wallack is respectable; and the ladies both of the opera and the ballet are not without desert. En passant, we must do Mr. Simpson the justice to say that his endeavors in getting up Cinderella are calculated to sustain his eminently high character as a manager, superior to whom there are none.

The chief attraction, however, of the opera is the prima donna, the gentle and beautifully artless Cinderella. We could praise much, but we do not wish to be thought rhapsodists; yet, what we shall say must be conceded by all who have heard and seen this splendid drama. The part of Cinderella, as well the acting as the singing portion, is admirbly adapted to the powers of Mrs. Austin; and we should suspect the English arranger, if not the author, of having designed the music for her, were we aware that Rossini or Lacy had any acquaintance with our Cinderella. The eminent knowledge and command of the portamento di voce possessed by Mrs. Austin, is of great effect in her execution of the thrilling tender passages to be found scattered through the piece. We would particularly mention the delightful melody with which you have already enriched your excellent miscellany. We need hardly direct the auditor's attention to that fine passage, descriptive of the situation in which the poor girl is placed. It is a piece of fine dramatic effect, and is calculated very strongly to move the sympathies of the audience. The duets beginning "Whence this soft and pleasing flame," and "Of the Baron's lovely daughters," abound in singular beauties.

Of the music of the third act we have already pretty fully spoken, and we close this article by requesting all who have not seen this gorgeous spectacle, to avail themselves of the earliest opportunity of witnessing one of the most splendid efforts of musical talent, whether of the composer or the vocalist, ever presented in this country.

In conclusion, we deem the production of Cinderella the second era in musical taste in our country; and we are convinced that the great success attending its representation is owing chiefly to the increasing desire for musical compositions of merit, and the destruction of a false and vicious taste.

THE FIRST DAY OF SPRING.

The first spring day! what magic dwells
In its pure air, of gladness breathing,
Which thus around our hearts the spells
Of olden-time is wreathing?
'Tis redolent of hope and youth,
The freshness of our early days,
The buoyancy of soul, ere truth
Had darkened fancy's rays.

It is as if our spirits were
To childhood's days again returning,
And those life-breathing joys we share
For which our souls were yearning.
A melancholy, strange yet sweet—
A sudden wild awakening
Of thoughts long past, our spirits greet
With the first day of spring.

All own, but none can tell what means
This gush of sweet though mournful feeling,
Nor why with spring's fresh coming scenes,
We find it o'er us stealing;
The desert heart a garden seems,
And withered feelings bloom again;
And early hopes and vanished dreams
Flash o'er the heart and brain.

And memories vague and undefined,
That come and go like summer lightning,
The deep recesses of the mind
With sudden light are bright'ning.
Methinks our spirits have not been
Tenants of this dark earth alone,
But some bright world, unstained by sin,
Ere this hath been our own.

For there are recollections dim,
Of some blest previous existence,
And o'er our hearts their shadows skim
In dim and dream-like distance;
We cannot catch nor mark them down—
One glimpse of their departing wings
Is all that we can call our own
Of these bright visitings.
Like some glad dream which slumber blest,
But which from waking thought doth sever;
We know that it hath charmed our rest,
But can recall it never!

THYRA.

THE PHILOSOPHER AND THE DIVER FOR PEARLS.

"Do you know," said a great philosopher to a pearl diver,
"do you know why the pearl grows in the oyster?"

"No," answered the diver, whereupon the other turned up his nose at him.

"Can you dive to the bottom in twenty fathoms and bring up these pearls?" said the diver to the philosopher.

"Not I," answered the other, contemptuously.

"What an old fool is this fellow," thought the diver to himself, "to be studying how pearls grow instead of learning how to catch them."

GOOD ADVICE.

One asked his friend what he should do when he did not know what to say in company, who replied, "hold your tongue."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

FRENCH NOTIONS OF THE AMERICAN NOVELIST.

MESSRS. EDITORS—It is well known that Mr. Cooper's productions have drawn forth more praise from French, German, and English critics than they have from his own countrymen. I find in the last received number of a celebrated literary and scientific periodical, published in Paris, the following notice of the Water Witch, and translate it for the benefit of those of your readers who may not fall in with the journal from which it is taken.

From the Revue Encyclopédique.

"It was an observation of La Fontaine, that the world was old, but still to be amused like a child. And in truth, nothing has been left untried in the regions of imagination that could benefit or divert the public: the jack-o-lanterns of the marsh, the witches of the mountain, the imps of the woods, the spirits which haunt ruined towers, the good fairies who glide from heaven to earth on a silver moonbeam, and illumine with their bright crown the chamber of the maiden whom they come to assist; the goblins which murmur strange words in the ears of the dreamer, and amuse themselves by vexing and playing their pranks among the dairy-maids; in short, all the capricious descendants of the witch of Endor, dwelling among rocks and caverns, have been successively called out from their hiding-places. The air is peopled with phantoms, the fire with salamanders, the sea with a phantastic race of spirits. But we have wanted a genius of the storms, a spirit which sports upon the swelling waves, directs the tempest at his will, breathes into the flowing sails, lends a soul to the ship, and hovers over the sea as over a mysterious world, whose aspects and changes it delights in contemplating. Mr. Cooper has conjured up this spirit; the limitless ocean is to him a second country. On shipboard he feels himself at home, and the whistle of the boatswain is to his ear as delightful a melody as the song of the nightingale. He has been cradled on the waters, and in his infancy lulled by their murmurs. The black spot just appearing in the distant horizon is to his eye the presage of tempest and danger. At the age when sensation is most vivid, and its impressions most ineffaceable, he was a mariner, so that he comprehends minutely this life of contemplation and action, of energy and idleness; this contest of man with the elements, which he has conquered by the force of his intelligence. He excels in describing the threatening surge with its crest of foam, the deep abyss in the waters, the murmur which announces the coming storm, and all the picturesque lights and shadows spreading over this vast and magnificent mirror. Many poetical minds, among others those of Byron and Madame de Staël, have given us the profound and sublime emotions which the sight of the ocean is calculated to inspire. But no one had as yet made us live in complete intimacy with this fierce companion; no one had shown him to us in his rage and his playfulness. The author of the Pilot has not feared to carry on his story upon this vast theatre, and he has inspired it with the continual motives of interest and sympathy. He is generally fertile, full of power, ability to reproduce the great traits of nature in the wild forests of America, upon the sea, by the side of torrents, but not in the refinements of the city. Civilization is not the scene for him. When he undertakes to paint artificial manners, his talent weakens and fades; and because the works of God reveal their beauties to genius, but those of men to mere talent. Some naïvé and almost savage characters appear frequently in the works of the American Scott. Long Tom on the sea, and Leather Stocking on the land, are two original and humorous creations to which we often recur, and which we love to recognise as old friends.

"To say that there is in this new romance every thing that has contributed to the success of the others, and perhaps still more, is to render it high praise. We might point out here and there a few blemishes, some extravagant and forced incidents; but it is a sorry task to quarrel with one who has opened before us the treasures of his intelligence. We keep the memory of pleasure only, and Mr. Cooper has afforded us a great deal of it."

There are some good points about this article, though it is full of what is called in Byron's correspondence enthusiasm; but, being from the pen of a lady, it is beyond the reach of strict criticism.

The following epitaph by Burns, inscribed over the grave of Major Nichol, in a country church-yard near Glasgow, has been handed us by a correspondent, who copied it from the stone. We do not recollect to have seen it before in print:

Ye maggots feed on Nichol's brain,
For few sic feasts ye ha' gotten;
And stick your claws in Nichol's heart,
For deil a bit ont's rotten.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

CONVERSATION.

WHAT a charming power is that of conversing with ease and intelligence. How much of human happiness depends on the exercise of it. How many humble hearths are rendered cheerful—how many fashionable circles are made to sparkle with gaiety by the simple interchange of thoughts and feelings! And what a different effect each person produces in respect to this accomplishment! While one inspires you with mirth or animation, another drags your attention reluctantly along the dim course of his thoughts, and makes a minute seem an hour. Some appear endowed by nature with an instinctive perception of delicacy and propriety, and steer their way carefully through the prejudices, peculiarities, and awkward circumstances connected with the character or situation of their hearers, while others blunder on, regardless of everybody's feelings, thrusting themselves into business which does not concern them, and electrifying their friends by sudden bursts of opinion formed without judgment, and thus exploded without reference to time or place. This is quite consistent with every virtue of the heart and good quality of the understanding. I have a friend of this description, whose honesty is such an awkward and obstinate piece of business, that he ruffles the tranquillity of almost every one with whom he comes in contact. He piques himself not only upon never uttering a falsehood, but upon never concealing an impression of his own respecting any person or circumstance. He deems every shade of dissimulation equally base and contemptible, and is resolved never to yield the prerogative of being perfectly candid. No matter how placid the stream of social feeling may be, one acting on such a principle is sure to ripple it with some jarring and splashing observation, with as little respect to the comfort of those around him as was experienced by the worthy gentleman who thus addressed his host from the lower end of a crowded table: "Pray, my dear sir, have the kindness to inform me how long is it since your brother was hanged?"

Mr. Pelham, on the contrary, is one of those who recoil from the thought of giving offence. He is sprightly, well-informed, and intelligent, with a quick eye, both for the ludicrous and the beautiful; he is a close observer, and immediately after the occurrence of any interesting incident pictures it to you with the freshness of real life. But he can never recollect any thing when it is wanted, so that he resembles some of our rich men who have immense treasures locked up in chancery, or veiled in distant speculations.

"Well, Pelham, what's the news?" said some one to him the other evening, as he seated himself in the midst of a few friends.

"The information from Europe," he answered, "is very important. There's a packet in from London or Liverpool, I don't recollect which, and Mr. What's-his-name has been killed in Paris. By-the-by, Miss L., coming up Broadway just now, I met your friend Mr.—Mr.—Mr.—pahaw! What's the man's name? the little black-eyed fellow, you know, with a hooked nose, and he desired me to say that he wished you to join his family in a party to the theatre."

"When, Mr. Pelham?"

"Well now that's very curious," said he, "very curious indeed—he told me the night particularly, and mentioned that he should not be able to see you before the time, and therefore desired that you would come down and spend the afternoon with his wife and sister, but whether it was to-day or to-morrow or the next day, I vow I have forgotten. Master Burke is to play—they say he acts as well as Kean, and such a dear little rascal too. You know what the poet says: 'And still—and still the—the—wonder grew,' 'That one small head—one small head could—could—confound the thing, I've no more memory than a fool.'"

Old Henderson, now, is a worthy whose fault is just the other way. He has neither sense nor taste, but his memory is awful. I have seen him hold a large company enchained, not by the fascination of wit and eloquence, but by a downright overbearing determination to monopolize the whole conversation, and without the ingenuity to perceive that instead of admiring, one-half of his auditors are laughing at him and the other meditating upon the most respectful means of escape. I can excuse, and even sympathize with an old sailor or soldier who has risked his life a thousand times in the dangers of sea and battle, for dwelling with enthusiasm, which he imagines must be shared by all, upon those scenes and events where the chords of his noblest feelings have been struck, but protect me from the sturdy energy of those veteran prosers whose zeal and prejudices are all based on vanity and conceit.

"My dear friend," said Henderson to me one day as I was hurrying home to dinner a few minutes after the time; "listen to me one word more. I am old now, and may venture to state that my experience is not small. I have traveled, sir, traveled all over the United States and a part of Great Britain; and I kept a note-book, wherein I set down all the remarkable events—don't be in such a hurry, my dear fellow, I'm never in a hurry."

"Doubtless, doubtless, Mr. Henderson, but just at this moment—"

"Tush, man—you don't get an opportunity of hearing me every day."

"Thank heaven for that," thought I.

"In this note-book," he continued, "I set down, as I said before, all the remarkable things I heard and saw with all my apposite moral reflections. Thus, sir, I have accumulated a mass of the most valuable notes, thoughts, opinions, sketches of character, anecdotes, &c. &c. &c. You shall read them, my young friend. They will give you more insight into—"

"With pleasure, sir, but—"

"Why now there's your cousin Bob, as fine a fellow, sir, as ever trod shoe-leather, he knows my friend Stamford who traveled with me half—no, not half—yes—I think I may say half of the way. Stamford married a Miss Dunlap, at Plymouth. Her father was a doctor, as clever a fellow as ever—well—I remember it as well as if it were yesterday. It was on the sixteenth day of April 1799, and the next morning, says he to me, says he—"

But enough of this, lest the reader should grow as tired of him as I was. I should almost as cheerfully submit to the necessity of listening to another talking friend of mine, who has the misfortune to be an author. Long habits of writing, to which he has concentrated all the faculties of his mind, have made it impossible for him to give birth to a single idea before he has arranged it in a regular sentence, with suitable branches and a flowing period. Ask him how he does, and he reads you a homily on the state of his system—the causes of his diseases, and the method he has laid down for himself to accomplish a cure, with the swelling pomposity of Dr. Johnson. He'll quote Greek upon a tea-kettle. When he gives his well-known preliminary "hem," as he clears his throat for an attack, I wish I might get the toothache, as an excuse for taking my departure. Such a man in a stage-coach, where you are entirely at his mercy, is worse than the night-mare. Heaven preserve me from your professed shiners in conversation. But of the colloquists who are calculated to exhaust the patience, the mystified talker is the most provoking. He covers up an idea of the most ordinary signification, or rather buries it under a multiplicity of words. If you put an interrogation to such an one, he stops, reflects, and then commences narrating some anecdote which he intends to apply to something which he intends to say. He hovers round and round a subject, and just when you trust he is coming to the point, strikes off into some unknown region and leaves you perfectly bewildered as to his meaning. Either he has no mind, no opinions, or you see them through the medium of his conversational powers as you glance at nature through a prism, and behold fragments of trees, walls, rivers, and houses turned upside down in grotesque groupes, and colored with strange hues. Set a nervous, clear-headed person to transact business with one of this sort, and he will almost go mad.

Some are habitual praisers of every thing around them—others never open their lips but to snarl. These last are monsters in society. They prow around like vicious dogs, snapping and biting at whatever comes within their reach. Instead of comparing the faults and beauties, the virtues and vices of men and things properly together, and forming a conclusion as the balance is in their favor or against them, they ferret out the worst features, dwell upon them with malicious bitterness, and thus overwhelm every thing in indiscriminate condemnation.

In short, while the conversation of all is marked with the peculiarities of their respective dispositions and habits of life, few have attained that elegant familiarity with the world and the human heart which enables them in conversation to please all and offend none. Such an accomplishment is productive of the most agreeable advantages. It surrounds its possessor with a kind of cheerfulness, delightful to the walks of brilliant fashion and invaluable as the charm of the domestic circle. Yet, perhaps, few subjects engage less of the attention of scholars and eminent men of all classes. They too often exhaust their vivacity in the mental efforts of the closet, and pass among their friends mere abstracted, solitary, and sometimes disagreeable companions, unable to share the simple pleasures of life.

Boston, April, 1831.

I HAVE been tempted, by the great beauty of the day, and the fine light for pictures, to take a slight stroll among the painters' rooms. Mr. Harding, I believe, is generally considered our first artist in portraits, as this is the branch of the profession to which he has paid the most particular attention. He is a noble looking fellow, very large and muscular, with an agreeable and gentlemanly address. Some dozen years ago he was residing in Kentucky, and commenced his career by painting a tavern sign. He has since visited Scotland and England, and met there with a good deal of attention and success. For some of this I have heard it said he was indebted to the influence of that prince of successful impostors, John Dunn Hunter, who created such an excitement among the lords and ladies of Great Britain, and whose favor, during the continuance of the mania, would have been a passport to almost any rank of society.

Mr. Harding has a collection of some of the best heads in the country. All that are exhibited at his rooms are finished with a freedom and correctness quite remarkable. The features have a perfect definiteness, with no hardness of outline, and the draperies and dresses are gracefully arranged and finely colored. The head of Dr. Channing has been splendidly engraved, and you have probably seen it in your own city; that of Mr. Webster has been also engraved for a collection of his orations and congressional arguments, which has been recently published here. Besides heads of these distinguished individuals, Mr. H. has lately executed a fine portrait of Colonel Hamilton, the author of that most delightful of novels, Cyril Thornton; a likeness of John Randolph, which we will venture to pronounce perfect, without even having seen the original; and what are said to be very good resemblances of two or three of our presidents.

Miss Stuart, a daughter of the late celebrated painter, and a lady of considerable talent, is attracting attention by her rapid improvement in the art. To tell the truth, I had not formed a very high estimate of her powers, from some early specimens that she exhibited two or three years ago at the Athenæum; but her recent productions indicate genius, and promise the final establishment of a lasting reputation. It is but seldom that we see genius transmitted with a name; and it is pleasing to behold a child striving for the laurels which were so long and honorably worn by the parent, and which cluster so greenly over his grave.

You have, of course, several of Fisher's beautiful landscapes in New-York; but some of your rich men had better send on and purchase, at a liberal price, a couple recently finished, which much surpass any of his previous productions. They are both very beautiful, and make a striking contrast with each other. One represents a wilderness in perfect repose, with the color and position of the clouds, the stillness of the most light and delicate foliage, the unruffled smoothness of the waters, indicating a serene hush and quiet over the whole face of nature. There is not air enough breathing to move the thinnest leaf, or to stir a blade of grass. The other is of an entirely different character, representing a freshet; the sky with the variety of strong coloring that marks it when we have a brilliant sun, after the clearing away of a tempest; the overflowing waters reflecting the glow of the heavens; and the whole picture, in its multiplied details, alive with action. Mr. Fisher has at his rooms a number of smaller landscapes, which are exceedingly well done; and several portraits: to the latter class of pictures, as a more lucrative branch of the art, we are sorry to hear that he intends to devote himself.

The exhibition at the Athenæum gallery, which has done, and is yet to do, so much for the encouragement of the arts, has this year been deferred a month or two later than usual. Prizes are offered for the best painting by an American, which has never before been exhibited in Boston. By means of this exhibition in past years the proprietors of the Athenæum have been enabled to purchase several beautiful pictures, by foreign and native artists, to ornament their noble institution. Among these are two or three landscapes by Doughty, and a picture of the Mother and Child, by Allston. The latter is in a very peculiar style, and has been much admired. My next letter shall touch upon a subject or subjects that you had better remain in ignorance of till the time of receiving it. Till then, farewell.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—If you feel inclined to confer a favor on an industrious and useful man, you will oblige me by publishing this letter.

I am a great traveller and connoisseur in pictures—a christener, as it is termed abroad. The various excellencies and predominant characters of all the eminent painters, ancient and modern, have been my principal study, and have become so familiar, that I flatter myself I can distinguish them just as well in the dark as in the light, as a great connoisseur tells one wine from another with his eyes shut. I can talk about the sublimity of Salvator, the grace of Raphael, the coloring of Titian, the grouping of Caravaggio, and keeping, and light, and shade, and perspective, and all that, asleep or waking, in the most approved style, and according to the best models extant.

Any auctioneer having a lot of pictures for sale, or any gentleman having a gallery, may have them christened on the most reasonable terms and at the shortest notice. Without boasting, I may venture to say that I have established the reputation of more than one collection, and made the fortunes of a number of gentlemen, proprietors of galleries, by my skill in christening. More than one Raphael owes its existence to me; and I may say with perfect truth, that I have drawn hundreds of the pictures of great masters from the depths of oblivion. The Academies of Arts would do well to avail themselves of my services, as I understand there are a number of pictures in them that want christening sadly. I am, sir, your humble servant, PETER PAUL RUBENS REMBRANDT DUBSTER.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—I perceive you are meddling of late with every body's business and neglecting your own, I dare say, like most of your busy-bodies. Perhaps you will do me a good turn, as it relates to a business that don't concern you any more than the man in the moon.

I am at this present moment sitting in melancholy contemplation of my tailor's bill, commencing with Anno Domini 1827, and ending with that of 1830. I won't tell you how much it amounts to for fear the trifle would disgrace me in the eyes of my friends. This unreasonable fractional part of a man is one of the greatest usurers in the world—in or out of Wall-street. He charges all his good customers a thumping advance to pay for losses by bad ones—and then he expects the latter to pay their bills, as if the honest hum-drum fellow, who exist upon two coats a year had not paid them already!

This I hold to be a crying imposition upon the gentlemen who don't find it convenient to pay for a thing twice over, as it were—once out of the pockets of others and once out of their own. Perhaps you may think it a great hardship for people thus to pay for coats for other people to wear. But when you look round and philosophize, as I do sometimes, you will see that the very constitution of society is based upon this volunteer system of paying the piper. Honest men pay the piper for rogues, and full purses for empty ones. If a rogue picks my pocket—a supposition, I confess, somewhat inapplicable to its present state—I must pay my proportion of the costs of prosecution and afterwards help to maintain him in jail. If a fellow wastes his money in dissipation and his time in idleness, the saving and industrious must be taxed to maintain him on the parish; and if a rogue commits a murder, the same honest, industrious folks must pay the cost of his hanging—the catchpole, the hangman, the public prosecutor, the jury, and the judge are all paid by honest men for keeping rogues in order. It is unnecessary, I trust, to resort to any more examples to prove that the whole economy of the social state and intention of the laws, consists in putting a bridle in the mouths of honest people merely because others choose to be dishonest, and taxing the industrious that the idle may enjoy themselves.

Now I wish my unphilosophical tailor to ponder on these matters, and therefore request you will publish this letter, that he may see his error and refrain, in future, from pestering people that don't choose to settle bills which have been charged to others already. I have a great mind to consult a lawyer, whether he cannot be brought up under the statute of usury. But the truth is, I have no spare cash just now, and the liberal professions do nothing without money. Your old admirer,
DANDY DORICOURT.

P. S. I believe I owe you for a year's subscription—but you must get it of the good folks, who, as I said before, seem born to pay other people's debts—I wash my hands of the business.

WISE MEN AND WOMEN.—A wise man is said to be one who can speak well on all proper occasions; a wise woman, one who can be silent when necessary.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The North American Review. No. LXxi. April, 1831. Boston. Gray & Bowen. New-York. G. & C. & H. Carvill.

This work and the Quarterly form the most prominent, and indeed nearly the only periodicals here which have attained extensive reputation as reviews. The papers of each are contributed by distinguished gentlemen of the day, among whom are statesmen high in place and fame, and the most eminent writers of the learned professions. Journals so supported go abroad as professed samples of American literature, and upon them we stake our character as a literary people. We are not at present prepared to examine exactly how far they have satisfied the expectations of the world—what influence they have already exercised upon literature and the arts as they exist among us—what successful impostors in science or the belles lettres they have unmasked—what neglected merit they have rescued from obscurity—nor what standard of vigorous and correct style they have offered for the crowd of juvenile scribblers, destined to become supporters of their country's honor when the ripe scholars and veteran authors of the present generation shall have passed away from the earth. This may afford an interesting theme for future discussion, but at present we propose merely briefly to examine the contents of the single number before us.

The first article on the "Origin and progress of the French language," discovers much historical knowledge and patient investigation; but as it is rather abstruse, instead of entering into its merits we copy a translation of a choice and delicate old French song on the return of spring, written in the fifteenth century:

"Now Time throws off his cloak again
Of ermin'd frost, and cold and rain,
And clothes him in the embroidery
Of glittering sun and clear blue sky.
With beast and bird the forest rings,
Each in his jargon cries or sings:
And Time throws off his cloak again
Of ermin'd frost, and cold and rain.

"River, and fount, and tinkling brook
Wear in their dainty livery
Drops of silver jewelry;
In new-made suit they merry look;
And Time throws off his cloak again
Of ermin'd frost, and cold and rain."

From the next essay, entitled "Foreign relations of Mexico," we select the following account of the capital city of that republic:

"We do not believe there is a capital of equal size in the world entitled to more ignominious distinction in point of general immorality than the city of Mexico. Public opinion, so far from checking, encourages license. Domestic virtue in high society is a flower which rarely blooms; gallantry is systematized; every lady of rank has her regular and avowed admirer, and conjugal infidelity finds excuse and provocation in libertinism and neglect. Of the varied checks imposed by Providence upon the degrading passions of our nature, the highest in the scale is religion, the next is female influence. It was their combination which gave to chivalry its poetical, and which gives to true civilization its actual grace. As a chastener of the morbid propensities of humanity, the love of woman, using the word in its most exalted sense, is a moral agent of surpassing power; and as it often exists without the other element of our constitution to which we have just referred, so it may often without its aid effect the most salutary restraint. The lover who invests his mistress, if not with the attributes of perfection, at least with the charms which approach nearest to them, and who looks to the forfeiture of her pure affection as the severest of misfortunes, has a motive to virtue which rarely fails. The husband who regards the wife of his bosom not only with love, but with pride, has the same impulse in a different, but not less persuasive form. Where the level of female influence is low, where it is acknowledged only as a minister of sensual appetite, and where the female character is divested of the romantic purity which belongs to it, and made like Don Juan's successive heroines, only the object of licentious passion, we despair of witnessing moral beauty in any form. Domestic society has been beautifully described by a contemporary writer* as 'the seminary of social affections, the cradle of sensibility, where the first elements are acquired of that tenderness and humanity which cement mankind together; without female ascendancy this pure association can have no existence, and in its absence we discern one of the darkest moral blemishes of the Mexican community.'

This is followed by an interesting article upon the public economy of the Athenians.

* Rev. Robert Hall, of Bristol, England, whose eloquent works have recently, and for the first time, been collected and published at Andover, Massachusetts.

A communication on the "Character and abuses of the Medical Profession" forms the fourth, and comprehends many ingenious reflections; but, although pervaded by a vein of clear and rational observation, the style is weakened by the frequent occurrence of unnecessary expressions. These little wordy flourishes, with which writers amuse themselves before they send forth the idea, are like the attitudinizing of boxers and fencers before they make their pass. It is well enough in the latter, because they desire to perplex, provoke, and mislead. The more prominently the idea can be made to stand, without the drapery of language, the more striking and delightful will be its effect upon the reader. In the article in question we stumble every moment upon something which keeps us back from the point we are seeking; yet which we must climb over before we can arrive at the author's meaning. As for example: "Now we do not for ourselves object"—"and in saying this we make no claim to extraordinary liberality"—"we believe that there never was"—"an attentive observer may remark, however"—"we may remark, however"—"we wish we might hope to come to a result," &c.

The subject of the Waverley novels is next handled in a treatise full of good sense and eloquence; our room will only permit a few extracts:

"We can remember when the whole reading world shivered by reason of Mrs. Radcliffe's fearful mysteries; but a second reading, like the crowing of a cock, drove all her ghosts to their graves. When her gloomy procession had gone by, thousands of readers were surprised by the day-break, as they were devouring the Scottish Chiefs or Thaddeus of Warsaw; but a second reading served only to destroy all the charm of the first. This is true even of Miss Edgeworth, in a measure; her Lord Oldborough, a character which undoubtedly made more impression than any other which she ever drew, will not bear a second reading; but her substantial merits have secured for her a desirable and lasting fame. Now, the excellence of Scott appears in the fact, that his writings not only bear, but require a second reading; without it, we cannot realize the wealth of his imagination, nor the reach and majesty of his power.

"The reputation of Scott is built upon his works of fancy. He has labored in other departments of literature with great vigor and success. His biographical sketches, particularly, have been distinguished by their manliness and candor, though, with the exception of Napoleon, they were written without much exertion of his strength. That great work has not satisfied the demands of the world, but we presume that no living writer could have given equal satisfaction; and the truth is, that the gigantic character he describes is still too near us to be painted; we must wait till the lights and shadows are blended into their right proportions by the effect of distance and time."

Mr. Bulwer is mentioned with unjust severity; but probably provoked by the equally unjust praise which his admirers have lavished upon him:

"It is too late in the day to question whether works of imagination can be safely read; read they certainly will be, and safely, by those who do not go to excess. Scott has done much to guard against this danger; for with one sweep of his pen he has sent to forgetfulness whole armies of novels, which used to prey upon the time and feelings of the young. It is true, that some, like Bulwer's, struggle up, by dint of brazen impudence, into a temporary notoriety, which we shall be compelled to blush for in a year or two, as for the Counsellor Phillips passion, which once prevailed in our land; but this cannot be prevented—when a tree throws a thick and deep shadow over a landscape, such pestilent weeds are most apt to grow beneath it."

There is much force and truth in the subjoined remarks: "One word to readers of the present day. There is a power in scenes and narratives, which implies no power in the writer; and certain writers, without industry or talent, are carrying on an extensive system of imposition. They go to lunatic asylums, and note in their tablets the ravings of the maniac in chains; they study the Newgate Calendar, or write down the confession of some atrocious malefactor; and with these genuine horrors make a deep impression on the public mind. But the business is wholly mechanical; some paltry wax work, representing a bloody and ghastly form, may make the strong man start, and women faint away, while the pencil of Michael Angelo could not produce an effect half so striking; but no one is so absurd as to judge of a work of art from the shock which it gives; if equal judgment were shown in respect to novels, the public taste would no longer be insulted by works, in which such narratives as any veteran knave can furnish, are paraded as splendid specimens of invention and descriptive power."

We close our observations on this article with the following:

"There have been objections made to this work (Heart of Mid Lothian) and one is, as our papers say of the news, highly important if true. It is, that the moral effect is not good; the villain who caused all the misery of the story, and his unfortunate victim, are transferred to a station in which they enjoy whatever wealth, rank, and fashion can give. This is not the fact; they are not represented as enjoying any thing, but as leading a life made wretched by mutual reproach and self-upbraiding, while their rank is but the 'gilding of their woe;' and the author makes it sufficiently evident that none can enjoy it without health at heart. But it would have been easy to alter all this. By a single dash of his pen, the author could have brought them to justice; but he knew better, and has acted upon the principle that a writer gives the right aspect to vice when he represents it as destroying the peace beyond the power of riches and honors to repair it; and the right reward to virtue when he secures for it the universal applause of men.

"At some future time we may resume the subject, and if we do nothing more, may save some readers the trouble of picking out the information which Scott has given with respect to the materials which have suggested his scenes and characters."

This last idea, of saving us the trouble of picking out the information which Scott has given, is calculated to raise a smile. Perhaps the ingenious writer might condense all the stories of the great enchanter within the pages of the North American, and save us the trouble of reading any of the Waverley novels.

"British and American shipping," "The art of preserving beauty," "Memoirs of Oberlin," "Geology," "Imprisonment for debt," and the "Bank of the United States" are full of valuable information. The latter asserts the necessity of renewing the charter of that institution. The article entitled the "Water Witch," instead of being a review of the novel bearing that name, is an analysis of Mr. Cooper's talents and acquirements as an author. He allows this writer to possess the power of description in a very high degree.

"And," continues the reviewer, "it is most strikingly displayed in one department, in which no one can accuse him of imitation; in which nobody has preceded him, or has yet attempted to become his rival. Whatever opinions may be entertained of his success in other respects, all will agree, that his boldest and most triumphant march is on the mountain wave. He treads the deck with the same conscious pride with which the Highland outlaw stood upon his native heath. The ever-changing aspects of ocean, winds, and sky—the wild excitement and hurry of the combat—the terrors of the storm—the still deeper terrors of the desperate passage through the narrow channel, which despair only would attempt, and nothing but perfect skill could accomplish—all that a sailor sees, dares, and suffers, are as familiar to him as the scenery of the haunts of childhood is to us."

"We cannot, however, award him the same measure of praise for his skill in the delineation of character. Poverty of invention is not his ordinary failing; but he seems to be afflicted with a want of knowledge of human nature, which prevents him from giving a proper degree of distinctness and individuality, and, above all, variety to the persons of the drama. They seem to have been selected on the same enlightened principle which guided Falstaff in filling the ranks of his gallant company; 'mortal men—mortal men; they'll fill a pit as well as better.' In his creations of the softer sex Mr. Cooper appears determined that they shall not be exposed to the imputation of bringing a snare, by dint of vain and unprofitable attractions; and they are accordingly so painted as to leave the delinquent without apology who suffers them to beguile him. When he wishes them to assume the air of unusual liveliness and grace, he artfully invests them with the habiliments of the other sex. The most striking character which he has yet drawn, with the exception, perhaps, of the Spy, is carried in successive novels through the various stages of manhood, decline, and absolute decrepitude, until the reader is prepared to receive with composure the intelligence of his dissolution. This may be well enough; but there is not the same justifiable cause for introducing us anew to Betty Flanagan, notwithstanding the unexpected change in her condition, or for causing Sergeant Hollister to dawn upon the reader a second time, in the full-blown glories of a militia captain. His blacks, also, may be very meritorious personages in their way; but it wears the spirit to see a detachment of them grinning upon us at every turn, like the pyramid of shining faces that watched the dance through a window in the legend of Sleepy Hollow. This is a sort of demonology, which is very apt to pall upon the sense; and we are not unfrequently tempted to wish that the author were more inclined to imitate the philanthropic views of the Colonization society, and to export them, at least, from the dominions of romance."

It is understood that a formidable rival to both the Quarterly and the North American is about to enter the field. The Southern Review, it is said, will soon re-appear, aided by the most distinguished talent of the south. It would be superfluous to add how important are journals of this description in eliciting talent and giving a tone to our national literature.

GROWING STUPID.

I fear that I am growing dull,
And losing all my fire;
All relish for the beautiful,
All passion for the lyre.
Melody from a running stream,
And beauty on a brow—
The whole is a forgotten dream,
And cannot wake me now;
I look with quite as kind an eye
On ciphers as on songs;
On curling locks as listlessly
As on the curling tongs.

There is no glory in the sky
To make my bosom beat,
I never mind a glossy eye,
Nor symmetry of feet;
The waving of an ostrich plume
Is graceless to me now,
And the flower that nods in pride of bloom,
Above a haughty brow.
My chamber-mirror keeps indeed
Its old accustomed place,
But I have very little need
To see my altered face.

I used to love the sparkling wine,
And dote on lobster salads,
I thought Italian airs divine,
And quoted Spanish ballads;
I used to walk the sunny street,
And sometimes used to waltz,
My heart was always full of heat,
My pocket full of salts.
But, ah! those happy days are gone,
Those hours of bliss are faded,
And the sullen times that hurry on,
How darkly they are shaded!

I may not speak of poetry,
I may not think of beauty,
The fount of song is dry for me,
And rough the way of duty.
Farewell the pleasant and the fair,
The idle and the gay,
My face must wear the gloom of care
For many a weary day;
And, Mary, till I feel again,
That thought and heart are free,
My lyre shall hush the careless strain
It breathed to love and thee.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

NATIONAL LOVE OF LEARNING.

WHEN I was about twelve years old I suffered one of the greatest afflictions which could befall me, in the death of my father. I will not expatiate upon the feelings with which I took my last gaze upon his face, and afterwards beheld him covered up in the earth forever from my sight, nor the awful vacancy which he left for a long period in my bosom. Few have dwelt many years in this world without having sustained the loss of some one whom they loved, and they will easily imagine what I have not the power to describe; and to those who are yet ignorant of the dreary and prostrating anguish with which a son bends over the grave of a father, I can only say there is no art in language to make them conceive it. Long may it be before they become too deeply acquainted with it from the fearful lesson of experience. My surviving parent did not permit her grief to interfere with her duties to me. I was, therefore, placed at an excellent school, where, perhaps, the melancholy arising from my misfortune checked the thoughtless merriment of boyhood, and prepared my mind for study and reflection. A few years application fitted me to enter a college, where, if I did not distinguish myself for any marked talent, or extraordinary attainments, I certainly acquired reputation for intelligence, industry, and kindness of disposition. When I quitted the quiet scenes where, withdrawn from the corrupting influences and narrow interests of the world, the calmness of my mind was undisturbed by disappointment, I hope the regret with which I prepared to mingle with the jostling crowd, which throng all the avenues of business, was not confined to myself. The slender fortune of my father was now nearly exhausted, and I looked around in order to select the best means of obtaining an honest livelihood. My attention was, of course, first directed towards the learned professions, but, after a brief observation of the advantages which they would afford, I concluded that my circumstances would not permit me to embark in either. They are generally overstocked with candidates commencing with auspices much more favorable than any I could expect. Youths from wealthy and influential families, and many gifted with talents and superior education, would easily eclipse the unaided efforts of an humble and friendless individual, who made not the most distant pretensions to genius, who could neither write poetry nor recite an oration with any degree of grace, and who, withal, stood in need of an immediate income to answer the ordinary exigencies of life. Had I been entirely alone, I might possibly have undertaken the herculean labors requisite to the success of an unfriended and poor student. I should have hoped to make up by unremitting assiduity and rigid economy for the want of other advantages. But my mother was now declining in years, and destitute, after having expended much in the course of my education. I was therefore totally at a loss whether to embark for Canton on a salary, to set up a store, or to apply for a situation as clerk in some of the departments at Washington. The latter pleased my fancy most, and I departed for that city, performing as much of the journey on foot as was possible. A letter from the president of the college in which I had been educated, introduced me to several of the great men who there presided over the affairs of the nation. They treated me with excessive politeness, and a celebrated politician promised that I should have the first vacancy of any kind which ensued. One spoke of sending me to the Mediterranean, as secretary to the captain of one of our national ships—another declared that I should go as bearer of despatches to the court of Denmark—and a third assured me of his influence for the place of private secretary to the governor of one of the territories. At first I was quite dazzled with these agreeable prospects, and began to think myself a lucky fellow, who would one of these days look back upon my present necessities as the difficulties incidental to all young men.

"Hæc olim meminisse juvabit," said I to myself, as I trudged to my cheap and cheerless apartment one rainy day, to write my poor mother an account of my success.

For several weeks I lived upon hope and promises, till the patience of my patrons began evidently to tire of my importunities. After having waited one day for two hours in the ante-chamber of a famous individual, while members of congress, officers of the navy, and others were immediately admitted to his presence, I began to suspect I was wasting my time, especially when the door-keeper at length announced to me that it was two o'clock, and that Mr. L. never saw any one after two.

I went towards home, and stepped into a hotel to read the papers, where I overheard one gentleman remark to another, that the president had said he was pestered to death with "hungry office-hunters." "Indeed," added he, "Washington is swarming with them. Every idle fellow thinks he may come here, take a lucrative place, and make his fortune. The impudence and ignorance of these vagabonds are dreadful."

My cheek burned, my conduct flashed upon me in a new light, and the next morning at daybreak, with my little valise in my hand, I started on foot, and with a heavy heart, for Baltimore, on my way home.

When I arrived in my native city, and recounted my failure in very angry terms to my mother, I expected to find her as surprised and provoked as myself. But age, less sanguine than youth, is also less subject to disappointment.

"Your enterprise, my son," she said, "has terminated as I expected. The promises of the great to the needy are meant only for civility, their assistance is reserved for the rich and powerful. We must learn to live by our own labor, and during your absence I have received an offer for you, which, although less brilliant than an embassy to Denmark, will clothe and feed us honestly and respectably. Mr. B. an inhabitant of a village in one of the adjoining states, is desirous of establishing a school. He is neither a politician nor a wealthy man, but he is the father of four children, whom he wishes to enjoy the advantages of a decent education. His interest will induce him to aid us in the enterprise, and upon friendship so supported we may calculate with confidence. If you have no objections we will set about it immediately."

Admiring the superior wisdom of my mother, I instantly consented, and we set out the next day to make the necessary arrangements. We found the place inhabited by many families of the poorer sort, all wonderfully impressed with the

ONE of the most respectable inhabitants of this city, who selected for a previous number the article entitled the "Dean of Badajoz," has sent us the subjoined popular sketch, by Mackenzie. Although it is our wish to fill the Mirror with only original matter, the interest of the story, and the accompanying observations, form a sufficient inducement for its re-publication.—*Ede. N. Y. TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—The death of the late Mr. Mackenzie has shed a kind of additional interest over his works. The delicacy of his writings have very rarely been surpassed. He was intimately acquainted with the nicest shades of human passion and feeling, and has illustrated them with a force, grace, and discrimination, blended with a most seducing simplicity, which invest his compositions with a charm equally irresistible to the juvenile and the matured reader. Indeed it is one of their characteristic traits, that while boyhood finds a delight in his pages, age and wisdom are equally captivated. I have selected the story of La Roche, with the hope that you will consent to publish it in your excellent miscellany. In these days of essayists and novel writers, of bigotry and infidelity, all parties and sects may find in it a standard of style—a fine model of sentiment—and at least a temporary specific for the stir of narrow prejudice and ungentle passions. Doubtless many of your readers are already familiar with its beauties, but they can have no objection to another perusal. It is not one of the flimsy and glittering pieces of modern taste, which can stand the test only of a single examination. But my principal inducement has been to send this beautiful and touching picture of human nature in its fairest light, into the remote country villages, scattered through the United States, where I understand your journal is received by all classes of society, and is consequently read by thousands who never saw an edition of Mackenzie's works.

THE STORY OF LA ROCHE.

More than forty years ago an English philosopher, whose works have since been read and admired by all Europe, resided at a little town in France. Some disappointments in his native country had first driven him abroad, and he was afterwards induced to remain there, from having found, in this retreat, where the connections even of nation and language were avoided, a perfect seclusion and retirement highly favorable to the development of abstract subjects, in which he excelled all the writers of his time.

Perhaps in the structure of such a mind as Mr. —'s, the finer and more delicate sensibilities are seldom known to have place, or, if originally implanted there, are in a great measure extinguished by the exertions of intense study and profound investigation. Hence the idea of philosophy and unfeelingness being united, has become proverbial, and in common language the former word is often used to express the latter. Our philosopher has been censured by some, as deficient in warmth and feeling, but the mildness of his manners has been allowed by all; and it is certain that, if he was not easily melted into compassion, it was, at least, not difficult to awaken his benevolence.

One morning, while he sat busied in those speculations which afterwards astonished the world, an old female domestic, who served him for a housekeeper, brought him word that an elderly gentleman and his daughter had arrived in the village the preceding evening, on their way to some distant country; and that the father had been seized in the night with a dangerous disorder, which the people of the inn where they lodged feared would prove mortal; that she had been sent for, as having some knowledge in medicine, the village surgeon being then absent; and that it was truly piteous to see the good old man, who seemed not so much afflicted by his own distress as by that which it caused to his daughter. Her master laid aside the volume in his hand, and broke off the chain of ideas it had inspired. His night-gown was exchanged for a coat, and he followed his governant to the sick man's apartment.

'Twas the best in the little inn where they lay, but a paltry one notwithstanding. Mr. — was obliged to stoop as he entered it. It was floored with earth, and above were the joists not plastered, and hung with cobwebs. On a flock-bed, at one end, lay the old man he came to visit; at the foot of it sat his daughter. She was dressed in a clean white bed-gown; her dark locks hung loosely over it as she bent forward, watching the languid looks of her father. Mr. — and his housekeeper had stood some moments in the room without the young lady's being sensible of their entering it.

"Mademoiselle!" said the old woman at last, in a soft tone.

She turned and showed one of the finest faces in the world. It was touched, not spoiled with sorrow; and when she perceived a stranger, whom the old woman now introduced to her, a blush at first, and then the gentle ceremonial of native politeness, which the affliction of the time tempered but did not extinguish, crossed it for a moment, and changed its expression. 'Twas sweetness all, however, and our philosopher felt it strongly. It was not a time for words; he offered his services in a few sincere ones.

"Monsieur lies miserably ill here," said the governant; "if he could be moved anywhere."

"If he could possibly be moved to our house," said her master.

He had a spare bed for a friend, and there was a garret room unoccupied, next to the governant's. It was contrived accordingly. The scruples of the stranger, who could look scruples, though he could not speak them, were overcome, and the bashful reluctance of his daughter gave way to her belief of its use to her father. The sick man was wrapt in blankets, and carried across the street to the English gentleman's. The old woman helped his daughter to nurse him there. The surgeon, who arrived soon after, prescribed a little, and nature did much for him; in a week he was able to thank his benefactor.

By that time his host had learned the name and character of his guest. He was a protestant clergyman of Switzerland, called La Roche, a widower, who had lately buried his wife, after a long and lingering illness, for which travelling had been prescribed, and was now returning home, after an ineffectual and melancholy journey, with his only child, the daughter we have mentioned.

He was a devout man, as became his profession. He possessed devotion in all its warmth, but with none of its asperity; I mean that asperity which men, called devout, sometimes indulge in. Mr. —, though he felt no devotion, never quarrelled with it in others. His governant joined the old man and his daughter in the prayers and thanksgivings which they put up on his recovery; for she, too, was a heretic, in the phrase of the village. The philosopher walked out, with his long staff and his dog, and left them to their prayers and thanksgivings.

"My master," said the old woman, "alas! he is not a christian; but he is the best of unbelievers."

"Not a christian!" exclaimed Mademoiselle La Roche, "yet he saved my father! heaven bless him for it; I would he were a christian!"

"There is a pride in human knowledge, my child," said her father, "which often blinds men to the sublime truths of revelation; hence opposers of christianity are found among men of virtuous lives, as well as among those of dissipated and licentious characters. Nay, sometimes, I have known the latter more easily converted to the true faith than the former, because the fume of passion is more easily dissipated than the mist of false theory and delusive speculation."

"But Mr. —," said his daughter, "alas! my father, he shall be a christian before he dies."

She was interrupted by the arrival of their landlord. He took her hand with an air of kindness; she drew it away from him in silence, threw down her eyes to the ground, and left the room.

"I have been thanking God," said the good La Roche, "for my recovery."

"That is right," replied his landlord.

"I would not wish," continued the old man, hesitatingly, "to think otherwise; did I not look up with gratitude to that being, I should barely be satisfied with my recovery, as a continuation of life, which, it may be, is not a real good. Alas! I may live to wish I had died, that you had left me to die, sir, instead of kindly relieving me, (he clasped Mr. —'s hand,) but when I look on this renovated being as the gift of the Almighty, I feel a far different sentiment—my heart dilates with gratitude and love to him: it is prepared for doing his will, not as a duty but as a pleasure, and regards every breach of it, not with disapprobation, but with horror."

"You say right, my dear sir," replied the philosopher; "but you are not yet re-established enough to talk much—you must take care of your health, and neither study nor preach for some time. I have been thinking over a scheme that struck me to-day, when you mentioned your intended departure. I never was in Switzerland; I have a great mind to accompany your daughter and you into that country. I will help to take care of you by the road; for, as I was your first physician, I hold myself responsible for your cure."

La Roche's eyes glistened at the proposal; his daughter was called in, and told of it. She was equally pleased with her father; for they really loved their landlord—not perhaps the less for his infidelity; at least that circumstance mixed a sort of pity with their regard for him—their souls were not of a mould for harsher feelings; hatred never dwelt in them.

They travelled by short stages; for the philosopher was as good as his word, in taking care that the old man should not be fatigued. The party had time to be well acquainted with one another, and their friendship was increased by acquaintance. La Roche found a degree of simplicity and gentleness in his companion, which is not always annexed to the character of a learned or a wise man. His daughter, who was prepared to be afraid of him, was equally undeceived. She found in him nothing of that self-importance which superior parts, or great cultivation of them, is apt to confer. He talked of everything but philosophy or religion; he seemed to enjoy every pleasure and amusement of ordinary life, and to be interested in the most common topics of discourse; when his knowledge or learning at any time appeared, it was delivered with the utmost plainness, and without the least shadow of dogmatism.

On his part he was charmed with the society of the good clergyman and his lovely daughter. He found in them the guileless manner of the earliest times, with the culture and accomplishment of the most refined ones. Every better feeling, warm and vivid; every ungentle one, repressed or overcome. He was not addicted to love; but he felt himself happy in being the friend of Mademoiselle La Roche, and sometimes envied her father the possession of such a child.

After a journey of eleven days, they arrived at the dwelling of La Roche. It was situated in one of those valleys of the canton of Berne, where nature seems to repose, as it were, in quiet, and has enclosed her retreat with mountains inaccessible. A stream, that spent its fury in the hills above, ran in front of the house, and a broken water-fall was seen through the wood that covered its sides; below, it circled round a tufted plain, and formed a little lake in front of a village, at the end of which appeared the spire of La Roche's church, rising above a clump of beeches.

Mr. — enjoyed the beauty of the scene; but to his companions it recalled the memory of a wife and parent they had lost. The old man's sorrow was silent; his daughter sobbed and wept. Her father took her hand, kissed it twice, pressed it to his bosom, threw up his eyes to heaven; and, having wiped off a tear that was just about to drop from each, began to point out to his guest some of the most striking objects which the prospect afforded. The philosopher interpreted all this; and he could but slightly censure the creed from which it arose.

They had not been long arrived when a number of La Roche's parishioners, who had heard of his return, came to the house to see and welcome him. The honest folks were awkward, but sincere, in their professions of regard. They made some attempts at condolence; it was too delicate for their handling; but La Roche took it in good part. "It has pleased God," said he, and they saw he had settled the matter with himself. Philosophy could not have done so much with a thousand words.

It was now evening, and the good peasants were about to depart, when a clock was heard to strike seven, and the hour was followed by a particular chime. The country folks, who had come to welcome their pastor, turned their looks towards him at the sound; he explained their meaning to his guest.

"That is the signal," said he, "for our evening exercise; this is one of the nights of the week in which some of my parishioners are wont to join in it; a little rustic saloon serves for the chapel of our family, and such of the good people as are with us; if you choose rather to walk out, I will furnish you with an attendant; or here are a few old books, that may afford you some entertainment within."

"By no means," said the philosopher, "I will attend Mademoiselle at her devotions."

"She is our organist," said La Roche; "our neighborhood is the country of musical mechanism, and I have a small organ fitted up for the purpose of assisting our singing."

"'Tis an additional inducement," replied the other, and they walked into the room together.

At the end stood the organ mentioned by La Roche; before it was a curtain, which his daughter drew aside, and, placing herself on a seat within, and drawing the curtain close, so as to save her the awkwardness of an exhibition, began a voluntary, solemn and beautiful in the highest degree. Mr. — was no musician, but he was not altogether insensible to music; this fastened on his mind more strongly, from its beauty being unexpected. The solemn prelude introduced a hymn, in which such of the audience as could sing immediately joined; the words were mostly taken from holy writ; it spoke the praises of God, and his care of good men. Something was said of the death of the just, of such as die in the Lord. The organ was touched with a hand less firm—it paused, it ceased—and the sobbing of Mademoiselle La Roche was heard in its stead. Her father gave a sign for stopping the psalmody, and rose to pray. He was discomposed at first, and his voice faltered as he spoke; but his heart was in his words, and his warmth overcame his embarrassment. He addressed a Being whom he loved, and he spoke for those he loved. His parishioners caught the ardor of the good old man; even the philosopher felt himself moved, and forgot, for a moment, to think why he should not.

La Roche's religion was that of sentiment, not theory, and his guest was averse from disputation; their discourse, therefore, did not lead to questions concerning the belief of either; yet would the old man sometimes speak of his, from the fullness of a heart impressed with its force, and wishing to spread the pleasure he enjoyed in it. The ideas of his God and his Savior were so congenial to his mind, that every emotion of it naturally awakened them. A philosopher might have called him an enthusiast; but, if he possessed the fervor of enthusiasts, he was guiltless of their bigotry. "Our Father which art in heaven!" might the good man say—for he felt it; and all mankind were his brethren.

"You regret, my friend," said he to Mr. —, "when my daughter and I talk of the exquisite pleasure derived from music, you regret your want of musical powers and musical feelings; it is a department of soul, you say, which nature has almost denied you, which from the effects you see it have on others, you are sure must be highly delightful. Why should not the same thing be said of religion? Trust me, I feel it in the same way, an energy, an inspiration, which I would not lose for all the blessings of sense, or enjoyments of the world; yet, so far from lessening my relish of the pleasures of life, methinks I feel it heighten them all. The thought of receiving it from God adds the blessing of sentiment to that of sensation in every good thing I possess; and when calamities overtake me—and I have had my share—it confers a dignity on my affliction, and lifts me above the world. Man, I know, is but a worm—yet, methinks, I am allied to God—it would have been inhuman in our philosophers to have clouded, even with a doubt, the sunshine of this belief."

His discourse, indeed, was very remote from metaphysical disquisition or religious controversy. Of all men I ever knew his ordinary conversation was the least tinged with pedantry, or liable to digression. With La Roche and his daughter it was perfectly familiar. The country round them, the manners of the village, the comparison of both with those of England, remarks on the works of favorite authors, on the sentiments they conveyed, and the passions they excited, with many other topics in which there was an equality, or alternate advantage, among the speakers, were the subjects they talked on. Their hours, too, of riding and walking were many, in which Mr. —, as a stranger, was shown the remarkable scenes and curiosities of the country. They would sometimes make little expeditions to contemplate, in different attitudes, those astonishing mountains, the cliffs of which, covered with eternal snows, and sometimes shooting into fantastic shapes, form the termination of most of the Swiss prospects. Our philosopher asked many questions as to their natural history and productions. La Roche observed the sublimity of the ideas which the view of their stupendous summits, inaccessible to mortal foot, was calculated to inspire, which naturally, said he, leads the mind to that Being by whom their foundations were laid.

"They are not seen in Flanders!" said Mademoiselle, with a sigh.

"That's an odd remark," said Mr. —, smiling.

She blushed, and he inquired no farther.

'Twas with regret he left a society in which he found himself so happy; but he settled with La Roche and his daughter a plan of correspondence; and they took his promise, that if ever he came within fifty leagues of their dwelling he should travel those fifty leagues to visit them.

About three years after, our philosopher was on a visit at Geneva; the promise he made to La Roche and his daughter, on his former visit was recalled to his mind, by the view of that range of mountains on a part of which they often looked together. There was a reproach, too, conveyed along with the recollection, for his having failed to write to either for several months past. The truth was, that indolence was the habit most natural to him, from which he was not easily roused by the claims of correspondence either of his friends or of his enemies; when the latter drew their pens in controversy, they were often unanswered as well as the former. While he was hesitating about a visit to La Roche, which he wished to make, but found the effort rather too much for him, he received a letter from the old man, which had been forwarded to him from Paris, where he had then his fixed residence. It contained a gentle complaint of —'s want of punctuality, but an assurance of continued gratitude for his former good offices; and, as a friend whom the writer considered interested in his family, it informed him of the approaching nuptials of Mademoiselle La Roche with a young man, a relation of her own, and formerly a pupil of her father's, of the most amiable disposition and respectable character. Attached from their earliest years they had been separated by his joining one of the subsidiary regiments of the canton, then in the service of a foreign power. In this situation he had distinguished himself as much for courage and military skill as for the other endowments which he had cultivated at home. The term of his service was now expired, and they expected him to return in a few weeks, when the old man hoped, as he expressed it in his letter, to join their hands, and see them happy before he died.

Our philosopher felt himself interested in this event; but he was not, perhaps, altogether so happy in the tidings of Mademoiselle La Roche's marriage as her father supposed him. Not that he was ever a lover of the lady's, but he thought her one of the most amiable women he had seen, and there was something in the idea of her being another's for ever, that struck him, he knew not why, like a disappointment. After some little speculation on the matter, however, he could look on it as a thing fitting, if not quite agreeable, and determined on this visit to see his old friend and his daughter happy.

On the last day of his journey, different accidents had retarded his progress; he was benighted before he reached the quarter in which La Roche resided. His guide, however, was well acquainted with the road, and he found himself at last in view of the lake, which I have before described, in the neighborhood of La Roche's dwelling. A light gleamed on the water, that seemed to proceed from the house; it moved slowly along as he passed up the side of the lake, and at last he saw it glimmer through the trees, and stop at some distance from the place where he then was. He supposed it some piece of bridal merriment, and pushed on his horse that he might be a spectator of the scene; but he was a good deal shocked, on approaching the spot, to find it shone from the torch of a person clothed in the dress of an attendant on a funeral, and accompanied by several others, who, like him, seemed to have been employed in the rites of sepulture.

On Mr. —'s making inquiry who was the person they had been burying? one of them, with an accent more mournful than is common to their profession, answered, "Then you knew not Mademoiselle, sir? you never beheld a lovelier."

"La Roche!" exclaimed he, in reply.

"Alas! it was she, indeed!"

The appearance of surprise and grief which his countenance assumed attracted the notice of the peasant with whom he talked. He came closer to Mr. —.

"I perceive, sir, you were acquainted with Mademoiselle La Roche."

"Acquainted with her! Good God! when—how—where did she die? Where is her father?"

"She died, sir, of heart-break, I believe; the young gentleman to whom she was soon to have been married was killed in a duel by a French officer, his intimate companion, and to whom, before their quarrel, he had often done the greatest favors. Her worthy father bears her death, as he has often told us a Christian should; he is so composed as to be now in his pulpit, ready to deliver a few exhortations to his parishioners, as is the custom with us on such occasions. Follow me, sir, and you shall hear him."

He followed the man without answering. The church was dimly lighted, except near the pulpit, where the venerable La Roche was seated. His people were now lifting up their voices in a psalm to that Being whom their pastor had taught them ever to bless and to reverence. La Roche sat, his figure bending gently forward, his eyes half closed, lifted up in silent devotion. A lamp placed near him threw its light strong on his head, and, marked the shadowy lines of age across the paleness of his brow, thinly covered with gray hairs.

The music ceased. La Roche sat for a moment, and nature wrung a few tears from him. His people were loud in their grief. Mr. — was not less affected than they. La Roche arose.

"Father of mercies!" said he, "forgive these tears; assist thy servant to lift up his soul to thee; to lift to thee the souls of thy people! My friends! it is good so to do; at all seasons it is good; but, in the days of our distress, what a privilege it is! Well saith the sacred book, 'Trust in the Lord; at all times trust in the Lord.' When every other support fails us, when the fountains of worldly comfort are dried up, let us then seek those living waters which flow from the throne of God. 'Tis only from the belief of the goodness and wisdom of a Supreme Being, that our calamities can be borne in that manner which becomes a man. Human wisdom is here of little use; for, in proportion as it bestows comfort, it represses feeling, without which we may cease to be hurt by calamity, but we shall also cease to enjoy happiness. I will not bid you be insensible, my friends! I cannot, if I would (his tears flowed afresh)—I feel too much myself, and I am not ashamed of my feelings; but therefore may I the more willingly be heard; therefore have I prayed God to give me strength to speak to you; to direct you to him, not with empty words, but with these tears; not speculation, but from experience—that while you see me suffer, you may know also my consolation."

"You behold the mourner of his only child, the last earthly stay and blessing of his declining years. Such a child, too! it becomes not me to speak of her virtues; yet it is but gratitude to mention them, because they were exerted towards myself. Not many days ago you saw her young, beautiful, virtuous, and happy; ye who are parents will judge of my felicity then; ye will judge of my affliction now. But I look towards him who struck me; I see the hand of my father amidst the chastenings of my God. Oh! could I make you feel what it is to pour out the heart, when it is pressed down with many sorrows, to pour it out with confidence to him, in whose hands are life and death, on whose power awaits all that the first enjoys, and in contemplation of whom disappears all that the last can inflict! For we are not as those who die without hope; we know that the Redeemer liveth; that we shall live with him, with our friends, his servants, in that blessed land where sorrow is unknown, and happiness is as endless as it is perfect. Go, then, mourn not for me, I have not lost my child; but a little while and we shall meet again, never to be separated. But ye are also my children; would ye that I should not grieve without comfort? So live as she lived; that, when your death cometh, it may be the death of the righteous, and your latter end like his."

Such was the exhortation of La Roche; his audience answered it with their tears. The good old man had dried up his at the altar of the Lord; his countenance had lost its sadness, and assumed the glow of faith and of hope. Mr. — followed him into his house. The inspiration of the pulpit was past; at the sight of him the scenes they had last met in, rushed again on his mind; La Roche threw his arms round his neck, and watered it with his tears. The other was equally affected; they went together, in silence, into the parlor where the evening service was wont to be performed. The curtains of the organ were open; La Roche started back at the sight.

"Oh! my friend!" said he, and his tears burst forth again.

Mr. — had now recollected himself; he stepped forward, and drew the curtains close—the old man wiped off his tears, and taking his friend's hand,

"You see my weakness," said he, "'tis the weakness of humanity; but my comfort is not therefore lost."

"I heard you," said the other, "in the pulpit; I rejoice that such consolation is yours."

"It is, my friend," said he, "and I trust I shall ever hold it fast; if there are any who doubt our faith, let them think of what importance religion is to calamity, and forbear to weaken its force; if they cannot restore our happiness, let them not take away the solace of our affliction."

Mr. —'s heart was smitten; and I have heard him, long after, confess that there were moments when the remembrance overcame him even to weakness; when, amidst all the pleasures of philosophical discovery, and the pride of literary fame, he recalled to his mind the venerable figure of the good La Roche, and wished that he had never doubted.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

MUSICAL MANIA.

"Viva la musica!"

ALTHOUGH fortune has blessed me with most of the comforts and luxuries of life, I have been rendered wretched for the last several months, by a circumstance in which you, Messrs. Editors, are in some degree implicated. There can be no egotism in the assertion that I am a plain, honest, industrious man, taught from my earliest years to consider business as a matter of prime importance, and equally well skilled in the arts of making and of keeping money. In my counting-house lies all my enjoyment. My reveries are generally upon matters of trade; and, in my opinion, there is no more useless, insignificant, and crazy person than one who does not seek his principal gratification in the transactions of some sort of profession. It was my misfortune, (for I am now compelled to term it so,) to associate with me in the firm, a few years ago, a young man, for whom I entertained a sincere regard; and who, besides my esteem for him, possessed an additional claim upon my attention, viz. a handsome capital, which proved useful in my concerns. You must understand that (as my friends say) one of the peculiarities of my character is a strong dislike to music. Nature has formed me so destitute of "ear," that I can scarcely distinguish one tune from another. It is a mystery to me what pleasure people find in listening to a set of fellows (who ought to be cultivating the earth, or occupied in some other decent employment), scraping and blowing all sorts of ridiculous noises on all sorts of absurd instruments. A party of friends, the other night, fairly entrapped me into an engagement to accompany them to the theatre, for the purpose of seeing, or rather hearing Cinderella. For some time I sat with "sad civility," and endured the din, thinking of Pope's lines,

"The dog-star rages, nay 'tis past a doubt,
All bedlam or Parnassus are let out."

I do not know whether I should not have soon disappeared, as I was anxious to see that the cash was properly balanced at the store; but, luckily, foreseeing that I should need some rational means of passing away the time, I had wisely filled my coat pockets with pea-nuts and apples, which I ate with great satisfaction, notwithstanding divers incomprehensible frowns from my neighbors. Indeed one little gentleman, who, I had been informed, was Count Flippertiflap, after writhing and twisting for some time in apparent agonies, turned suddenly and fiercely upon me, and said in broken English,

"Sair, begair you shall be turned out of every theatre Français, wis your dem pig-nuts."

"I tell you what, neighbor Flippertiflap, if that's your name," said I, cracking a large nut, "I should like to know what law you can show for preventing a man from eating pea-nuts in a free country? You'd better attend to the music, and leave me to my pea-nuts. 'Every one to his own taste, as the old woman said when she kissed the cow.'"

Ha, ha, ha! Messrs. Editors, I think I walked into him there a leetle grain, don't you? I guess he thought so too; for, muttering something between his teeth, which I could not understand, and casting upon me a look like that of a cur when he shows his teeth, and growls just before he bites, he left the box, and slammed the door after him, with a violence that showed I had got the better of him in the argument. A little while afterwards I saw him in a box opposite, bobbing his head up and down, and beating the cushion with his hand, while somebody on the stage was cutting up some demi-semi-quaver or other flourish without any name.

My partner Charles and I are both unmarried men, and board at the same house; and now I am coming to the difficulty, which induced me to depart so far from my usual business habits as to compose a communication for a public journal. In proportion as I hate music, Charles loves it. He possesses a mischievous facility in catching every air, and in remembering it; and, although I could never perceive any difference between his voice and mine, his musical friends say that his tones are firm, sweet, and round beyond comparison. It's all darkness to me this talk about a sweet round voice. Be that as it may, he has been seized with the Cinderella mania, at present prevalent in this city; and ever since this abominable opera was produced, his senses have been evidently a little wandering. He knows it, I am sure, from beginning to end, and makes no secret of his vocal ability. Indeed so thoroughly is he imbued with the melodies of this popular production, that he reminds me of a powder magazine: you cannot touch him with any note or allusion calculated to remind him of the opera, but he goes off in a musical explosion.

"Charles," said I, the other day, "I am going to call on Hanford & Co. in relation to Grant's note. It's a very pleasant morning, and?"

Charles elevated his right arm, cast his eyes towards the ceiling, and exclaimed,

"Morning its sweets is flinging
Over each bower and spray,
Flowers to life are springing
To greet the opening day.
Soft floats around
The waters!"

"Confound your nonsense; listen to me one word!"

"Listen," said Charles, "to be sure I will listen."

"From the lips of men of wisdom Counsel, they say, comes ever wiser."

"Mr. Wiley," said I, "will you have the goodness to tell me where is the porter?"

"He is yonder in the office,
He is yonder in the office,
Soon he'll come—then hope farewell!"

In this way, Messrs. Editors, am I wearied from morning till night. He asks for his breakfast in a soprano, and tells one how late it is, to the tune of "Mildly beaming, brightly gleaming."

We were once detained very late in the evening at the store, in consequence of a press of business. I became absorbed in overlooking some important letters, and unwarily bent my head so near the candle that my hair took fire.

Instead of informing me of this event, as any rational creature would have done, my musical friend laid his hand on his heart, and commenced "Whence this soft and pleasing flame," and before he had finished the graces of the first line I can tell you I was tolerably well singed.

The other day, being the sabbath, we were returning from church in the midst of a crowd, when he commenced a part of the quintette,

"Midst doubts confusing,
Uncertain musing," &c.

The people stared, and looked round after us as we walked; but he grew every moment more and more animated. Provoked and ashamed to be seen in the society of a person committing such a flagrant outrage on decency and public opinion, I quickened my pace to outwalk him, if possible; from a brisk step I proceeded to a stride, from a stride to a trot, and from a trot to a full run; in all of which I was accompanied by my mad companion, who fairly chased me a great distance through the astonished multitude, until he had finished, "Midst doubts confusing," and brought me up breathless, with "Softly, softly, in a whisper," which might have been heard across the street.

We had a business transaction, of much importance, some time ago with an old gentleman, who piques himself upon the nobility of his family. He is pompous—which he thinks dignified—and grave, which he supposes wise; a troublesome, stiff, wrong-headed old fellow as ever wore a wig, and the only good thing about him is, that he hates music as he does the screaming of the animal which philosophers say it is not judicious to cast pearls before. Charles had run through some accounts, and was standing by the window with his back turned to us.

"Only that column remains," said Mr. Vertigo. "Five thousand dollars, ten thousand dollars. There is only one way, Mr. Ward, for a merchant to settle these affairs, and I learned that from my father. My father, Mr. Ward, was one of the"

"And the jackass was your father;
Yes, the jackass was your father;"

hummed Charles.

I suppose Mr. Vertigo never heard of the opera. I have not been able to explain this matter to his satisfaction. He looks upon Charles as a very rude young man.

Driven to desperation by this disease in my friend, I hit upon a method which I hope will tend towards a cure. He accompanied me one day upon a visit to a respectable quaker family, who have no more idea of music than so many blocks of wood. The household consisted of the father, mother, six pretty spruce maidens, and six staid demure youths, who were so impressed with the importance of behaving themselves even in their own home, that they scarcely ever spoke above a whisper, and stole about the house like cats. As I myself was very familiar with the whole of them, upon being shown into the front parlor I left Charles to amuse himself as well as he could, while I went into the sitting-room, where, as it was but a little after the dinner hour, the whole family happened to be assembled together. After a few grave observations from the old gentleman, I was about observing to them, that I had a friend in the front room, anxious to be introduced to Miss Lucy, (the prettiest of the daughters,) when our ears were struck with a stentorian voice from the adjoining apartment, shouting forth, "Swift as the flash," with a most voluminous display of vocal powers, and a desperate, and to me irresistibly ludicrous attempt to run through all the very difficult and complicated variations.

"What's that?" said Mr. Palmer.

The family regarded each other for some moments in silence, but with glances of astonishment. Lucy looked very much inclined to smile; her rosy mouth just betrayed a mischievous lurking dimple, and the little ones giggled aloud.

At that moment, while Charles was winding up the last variation with a little extemporaneous flourish of his own, an idea struck me, which I immediately put in execution.

"Why what in the name of wonder is that?" said the old lady.

"Hush!" said I, assuming a melancholy look, and putting my finger on my lip. "This is a poor unfortunate youth, whom I am about conveying to the lunatic asylum."

"Bless my soul!" said Mr. Palmer, while all exhibited symptoms of alarm, "why what a terrible thing this is. Is he docile?"

"Perfectly so, sir. You need be under no apprehension from any of his depredations."

"He is much to be pitied," said Mrs. Palmer; "only hear the poor unhappy young man."

Charles was now pretty deep in the comic duet, "Sir, a secret most important."

"He is, notwithstanding," said I, "a very interesting youth."

"What drove him to this desperate extremity?" asked one of the sons.

"Love, sir," said I, with a melancholy shake of the head.

"Poor, poor fellow," said Lucy, with much feeling.

"Perhaps you would like to look at him," said I.

"If there is no danger, I should," said Mrs. Palmer.

I opened the folding-doors softly, and discovered Charles at the very crisis of a grand flourish.

There were fifteen of us, besides a servant and two cats, all gazing eagerly at him. As he turned suddenly, his eye fell upon the group, and he stopped short, with such a wild expression of astonishment visible in his countenance, that he passed very well for what I had represented him.

"Are you sure he won't bite?" said Lucy.

"He is very good-looking," said the old lady, "for one in such a situation."

"Unhappy wretch," said Mr. Palmer, "what a horrid expression of face!"

"Mr. Ward—Mr. Palmer—ladies," stammered Charles, "I beg pardon—what's the meaning of all this?"

"Quite bewildered," said Lucy, drawing back fearfully as he approached. "What a pity he has no brains."

The embarrassment of poor Charles at length grew so apparent, that I feared he would actually become what his friends thought him. Finding, however, that he could obtain no explanation of the facts, he started suddenly out of the room, and ran into the street, since which period I have never heard him hum a tune.

KNOTTY QUESTIONS.

If you can find the drop of rain
That yesterday fell in the main;
If you can see how visions creep
Upon the pillow of our sleep;
If you can tell why some men love
The sunshine, some the shady grove;
Some women have their eyes of blue,
Some of the sparkling coal black hue;
If you can tell why fish that lave
Forever in the briny wave,
Are fresh, as all the world well knows,
While oysters that in sea repose
Are salt—why then I say, good man,
You'll tell much more than wise men can.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE WILL AND THE LAW SUIT.

BY A MEMBER OF THE BAR.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE DUCK, of Duck hall, was one of the most downright, hearty, and thorough-going patriots that ever mounted a table and spouted about freedom at a ward meeting.

"Liberty," said he, "consists in law. We are not governed by men, but principles. Beshrew those false-hearted knaves who deny the perfectibility of human governments! They are common slanderers of human nature. It is as plain as a pipe stem," (although Mr. Duck had not been through college, he cherished a natural taste for classical allusions,) "it is as plain as a pipe stem that a constitution may be constructed philosophically, and laws may be enacted so as to diffuse justice uniformly and universally. Why, look you now," continued he to his uncle Peter Crane, "look you, uncle, what can be more perfect than our present form of government? Our senate is a check upon our house of representatives—our house of representatives is a check upon our senate—the president is a check upon both of them, and both of them are checks upon him. By such a legislature, assisted by the states, no laws can be passed but such as are indubitably for the good of the people; and when passed, what an admirable institution are our courts of justice, where learned counsel on each side show the question in all its bearings, and leave it for judge and jury to decide upon after careful examination."

This Mr. Peter Crane was a famous hand for horses. After immense preparations to gain the purse offered at the races just then ensuing, he was prevented from participating in his usual amusement by an unpleasant accident. He 'died one day' of an apoplectic fit, and left a will, for the drawing of which he had paid twenty-five dollars to his friend, Timothy Fifa, Esq. attorney and counselor at law, commissioner of deeds, notary public, solicitor in chancery, corporation attorney, and notary to the "Yorkville New-York Washington United States Cahawba Agricultural Bank."

It is reported that Mr. Crane had originally drawn his own will; and being a plain man, and not anticipating any trouble touching the disposition of his estate after he should be gathered to his fathers, had just declared in ordinary English, and in the presence of competent witnesses, that he bequeathed so and so to such and such a person.

Timothy Fifa, Esq. attorney and counselor, commissioner, and so forth, as aforesaid, dropped in accidentally and detected this fraudulent proceeding against the interest of the profession. When he perceived what they were at, he rested his chin on the top of his cane, then fixed his eyes full upon the testator, and informed him that the phraseology of the document would invalidate the claims of his heirs.

"Lawyers," said he, "are sharp-eyed people; they'll detect a quibble and ruin the business. I'll prepare a substitute, which shall puzzle the whole fraternity."

The substitute which was to puzzle the whole fraternity, to use the language of Mr. Duck, of Duck hall, "contained the following claus:"

"And I, the said Peter Crane, of Crane hall, Craneville, in the county of Crane, on the north border of Crane river, do hereby give and bequeath unto my dearly beloved nephew, Napoleon Bonaparte Duck, of Duck hall, Duckville, in the county of Duck, all the four-legged quadrupeds belonging to me, and situate, lying, walking, standing, or in any manner whatsoever or howsoever being upon my estate."

By virtue of this will Napoleon Bonaparte Duck, of Duck hall, claimed twenty-seven full-blooded race horses, belonging to the estate of the testator. But lawyers are not so easily "puzzled." The executors firmly refused to deliver the horses. Mr. Duck was actually thunderstruck. He had set his heart upon them. To lose his uncle was bad enough in all conscience, but to lose the horses too, was intolerable.

"Pray, sir," said Mr. Duck to one of the executors, smothering his feelings, "on what ground do you detain my property?"

He was referred to counselor Capias, of Casa hall, Casaville. Burning with indignation did Napoleon Bonaparte Duck enter the office of counselor Capias.

"Counselor Capias," said he, laying his hand on his heart, "I am Napoleon Bonaparte Duck, of Duck hall."

"The devil you are," replied the counselor, "and who said you were not?"

"I've come, Mr. Counselor, to consult you about my horses."

"Horses, sir?" said the counselor, looking into his face keenly, over his glasses, as if he did not understand what he meant, "horses, my friend, what horses?"

"My uncle's horses, sir—my horses, sir—the horses situate, lying, and being upon Crane hall, Craneville, sir, in the county of Crane, on the north side of Crane river, sir."

"Crane hall? Horses?" said the lawyer, pausing and placing his fore-finger on his forehead, as if striving to call some forgotten thing to mind. Then his face lighted up suddenly. "Oh! ah! yes! oh, you're Mr. Duck?"

"Why, sir, who the devil should I be but Mr. Duck? Every inch a Duck."

Mr. Duck was very fond of Shakspeare, and always quoted him when he was getting into a passion.

"Well, Mr. Duck," inquired the counselor, composedly, "what can I do for you?"

"You can give me my horses, sir?"

The counselor laid his pen down upon the table and looked surprised.

"Do you take me for a livery stable-keeper, sir?"

"Look you, Mr. Counselor," said Duck, drawing from his pocket a copy of the will, "there, sir, is my uncle's will; here he bequeathes to me, sir, his dearly beloved nephew, sir, Napoleon Bonaparte Duck, of Duck hall, sir, all the horses on his farm. The executors have refused them to me, and referred me to you. Will you have the kindness to give me an answer?"

"I see nothing here about horses," said Capias, after humming over the contents of the will.

"Thunder and lightning!" said Duck, losing his patience; "read that claus, sir; don't you see—all the four-legged quadrupeds, sir, 'to my dearly beloved nephew I bequeath all the four-legged quadrupeds,' sir, &c. &c. What do you say to that, sir?"

"Mr. Duck," said the lawyer, mildly, "I perceive you are not much acquainted with these matters. This document entitles a person calling himself Duck, to claim all the four-legged quadrupeds—all the four-legged, you see—now we contend that the quadrupeds on the Craneville estate have five legs."

"Fire and fury!" said Napoleon Duck, "quadrupeds with five legs? I did not expect to be insulted, sir. I'll commence a suit instantly—you are a—"

"Pardon me, Mr. Duck," interrupted the counselor. "I am well aware that, philosophically speaking, quadrupeds have only four legs. But philosophy is one thing, Mr. Duck, and law is another, Mr. Duck. Now Barbeyrac, in his notes on Puffendorf, accedes that four are not five; and your uncle, although de mortuis nil nri bonum, should have worded his will so as to include all animals, fera natura, as well as others, without any reference to legs whatever, for Justinian, lib. 2, tit. 1, section 12, declares that fera igitur bestiae simul atque—"

"The man's mad," thundered Duck, leaving the room and slamming the door violently after him. He went straightway to counselor Fifa, gave him fifty dollars, with orders to institute an action immediately against the executors. In due time a verdict was recovered for the plaintiff, who, however, had to pay a heavy bill of costs notwithstanding his success.

"Executors never pay costs," said lawyer Fifa. "Lord, sir, didn't you know that? I thought everybody knew that."

Fifa took a pinch of snuff, the clerk giggled, and Duck started for the office of counselor Capias, a little dashed with the bill of costs, but evidently gratified with the triumph he was about to consummate over his old friend.

"Counselor Capias," said he, with a smile of satisfaction bordering on scorn, "I suppose you'll give me the horses now?"

"Not at all, Mr. Duck."

"Why, I have gained the suit, have I not?" asked Mr. Duck, with a stare of astonishment.

"Yes, sir."

"And the court decided that the horses should be delivered to me?"

"Oh, yes; but what of that? I'm going to carry it up."

"Carry it up!—carry what up?"

"The case, sir—the horses, sir. I'm going to certiorari. I told you you didn't understand these matters."

Duck absolutely evaporated with surprise, vexation, anger, and terror; and the next thing that was seen of him was that he was giving another fifty dollar note to lawyer Fifa.

"They've certioraried," said Fifa. "I'm glad of it. Don't be afraid, Duck, we'll beat them at last as sure as four aint five."

It being an issue in law, the case was argued before his honor, Mr. Justice Dobbs, of Dobbs hall, Dobbeville, in the county of Dobbs. Timothy Fifa, Esq. appeared for the defendant in error, and Casa Capias, Esq. for the plaintiff.

Capias for the now plaintiff. This was an action commenced in the court below, by the present defendant against the now plaintiff. The declaration states that Duck was entitled to twenty-seven horses from the estate of Crane hall, founding his claim upon a will, which bequeathed to him all the four-legged quadrupeds therein being. A verdict having been rendered for the plaintiff below, the defendant sued out a certiorari, and assigns for error, that the declaration, and the matters therein contained, were not sufficient in law to maintain an action. We rest our case on two points. The will gives the claimant a right to the four-legged quadrupeds being on the estate of the testator. Now, we contend, in the first place, that the testator, being dead, defunct, and not alive in law, cannot have an estate. The ambiguity of the document renders it utterly impossible and unjust for the claimant to recover. Secondly—the horses are not mentioned in the will. We think it may be easily proven to the satisfaction of your honor, that the horses claimed have legs. Fleta, Bracton, Puffendorf, Locke, Barbeyrac, and Blackstone declare that a leg is a part of the body. Now let me ask your honor what is a tail?—Quicquid autem eorum ceperis, eo usque tuum esse intelligitur, why a part of the body. Now, a leg is a part of the body, and a tail is a part of the body, ergo, in law, a tail is a leg, and a leg is a tail, ergo, a horse or quadruped with a tail has five legs, ergo, the quadrupeds in question here are not quadrupeds, but animals, quinquepedanti. Quod erat demonstrandum.

Fifa contra. May it please your honor, this is one of the most important cases that ever came under the consideration of a court of justice; a case which involves the liberties of millions; a case, the decision of which will go down as a precedent to posterity; a case which has the most direct bearing upon the happiness of the whole human race. For, your honor will perceive, that if quadrupeds or animals quadrupedanti can be metamorphosed into animals quinquepedanti, animals quinquepedanti, vice versa, can be turned into animals quadrupedanti—those into trespedanti, those into bis pedanti, those into unus or monos pedanti, and those into the Lord only knows what. Now, horses have always been considered animals quadrupedanti, as vide Fleta, b. 3. c. 2. p. 1008. Bracton, b. 2. c. 1. p. 700, therefore they can have but four legs. Secondly: the tail of a horse cannot be considered one of his legs, it being a distinct and less noble part of his body. Cum vero tuam caesarii custodiam, as Justinian saith. Suppose your honor cut off the tail of my horse, it will not prevent him from walking. But let your honor rursus occupantis sit, cut off one of his legs, and multa accidere soleant ut eam non capias, he will not be able to walk at all; therefore the tail of a horse is not one of his legs, ergo, a horse has but four legs.

Per curiam. The tail of a horse is one of his legs. It is evident that it is in a manner connected with his body. If you cut off the tail of a horse, the blood will run. If you cut off one of the legs, the blood will run. Ergo, the tail of a horse is one of his legs. The defendant in error, Mr. Duck, is not entitled to the horses. If there are any of them without tails, deinde ut fera, ita inclusa sit ut exire inde nequeat, then Mr. Duck is clearly entitled to them. D.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

BOSTON, April, 1831.

It must be confessed that a stranger coming into our city without acquaintances, or letters that would make them, must be in a very uncomfortable situation in respect to amusements. There are absolutely no public places of habitual and fashionable resort. The gallery of the Athenaeum exhibition of paintings is crowded with beauty a week or two in the summer; and our promenade place, Washington-street, for a couple of hours every fair day, is very proper for loungers and ladies. There are occasional concerts during the winter, that attract gontee audiences; and, once in a twelvemonth, some distinguished singer or tragedian may fill the boxes of the theatre. This absence of public amusements is accounted for, and in some measure compensated by the nature of our private society, and the number of balls, parties, and lectures which comfortably occupy the whole compass of the week.

You, of course, know that there is now but one theatre open in our puritanical city. The old establishment in Federal-street, that has witnessed the best acting of Cooke, Cooper, Fennell, the elder Kean, and Macready, has been obliged to yield to its younger and more showy rival. A year or two since, when it was first closed, there were propositions to convert it into a lecture-room; and subsequently, serious speculations on the practicability of turning it into a church. Both these plans failed, however; and during the present season it has been beautifully fitted up for an assembly or ball room. The Cadet company were the first who danced in it since its transformation; and two or three quadrille parties have succeeded them. It is very prettily arranged, and well adapted for such occasions, though we cannot look upon such a profanation of a temple of the drama without regret. It reminded us of the passage in Johnson's prologue, spoken by Gerrick at the opening of the Drury-lane theatre:

"Perhaps where Lear has raved and Hamlet died,
On flying cars new sorcerers may ride;
Perhaps, for who can guess the effects of chance,
Here Hunt may box, or Mahomet may dance."

The Tremont theatre was taken early last fall by its present manager, Mr. Russell, who had been previously playing at New-Orleans. It was opened with a strong company, and every effort made to deserve success. It lagged along some time after with the stock performers, with small houses, and consequently very meagre profits. Mr. Hackett was engaged for a few nights, and drew, if we remember rightly, some very respectable audiences. Mr. Forrest played Metamora to full boxes; and other characters, we are sorry to say, to very indifferent ones. Mrs. Sharpe, Mr. Cooper, Miss Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, appeared and disappeared with but a beggarly account for their own purses, or the pockets of our enterprising manager. Young Kean sometimes drew a full house—but seldom. Madame Feron played a week or two to the walls, and on her benefit night to quite the fullest and most fashionable assembly that had as yet honored the house during the season. Theatrical matters were looking very dull. The clergy had fulminated from the pulpit, and lightened from the press. Shares could be bought low. The members of the corps dramatique behind the scenes were more numerous than their auditors before them. The manager looked very dejected in public, and had reason to scold very hard in private; and the players, we presume, were getting hoarse and sulky from the mortification of being obliged to talk to empty benches. It was foretold that the drama had suffered a total and perpetual eclipse.

You have all heard from the papers what little Burke did, in spite of the opposition. On the first evening of his appearance there were one or two fashionable parties, and places were to be had in good boxes till a late hour in the performance. There were no broken heads caught in fighting for tickets. The next morning, however, saw quite another sight. The box-office was besieged from an early hour by stout Irishmen and sturdy Africans; and hundreds were obliged to go away disappointed, who were unwilling to venture their tender bodies in the no-person-respecting crowd. The house was filled in every corner with all the beauty of Boston and the vicinity; and so it continued to be during the whole of the boy's stay with us; and so it probably would have been if he had remained a month longer. But Burke went, and the theatricals went with him; and after a considerable absence have but just returned to our metropolis.

What will be their present reception is a great deal more than I will undertake to prophesy; what Mr. Russell and his very excellent company deserve, is a point to be settled much more easily. The remainder of this letter, and the whole of another, may be not unsuitably devoted to the more prominent actors now on the Boston stage. I should dispatch them in a much more summary manner, if it were not a fact that there is a good deal of talent and merit among them; and that it is easier to praise or criticize at a distance than to praise or criticize near at home.

Mr. Finn, I suppose, is entitled to the first notice, as an old favourite, an inimitable actor, and a most worthy man. Some years ago he played in tragedy here, and within a few months, I believe, he has appeared in this line in some of the southern cities. To any one who has seen him in his farce or comedy, such an idea must be at once exceedingly ludicrous. The thought of turning the face of Dr. Pangloss or Beau Shatterly into that of Lear or Hamlet, though it may answer with some countenances, will not do with that of Mr. Finn. We should, of course, see at once that it was all humbug; and, like Letitia Hardy, refuse to be "come over with his Jim-Jams." There is, probably, no actor in the country who understands the details of his profession better than Finn. Being something of a scholar, he is familiar with the written as well as the acted drama, and with the lives of the most celebrated performers and dramatists who have flourished since the invention of the art. Having visited England, and of course profited by his visit, he has had opportunities of seeing the best examples, and availing himself of all the hints he could collect from them. He has studied costume and character, is perfectly familiar with all the stage-trick and business, and knows how to use them to the best advantage. Add to all this, a mind delicately observant of the ludicrous, and a face that can catch and express the utmost of grotesque humor, and you can easily understand why Mr. Finn is so admirable in his line of character. He has written some plays, and dramatized a novel, or so; and one of his melo-dramas was published here, and performed a good many times. If we remember correctly, it possessed in some parts considerable poetical merit, as well as some broad humor. He has written also a good many convivial songs for public occasions, abounding in bad puns and worse rhymes, which were exceedingly paltry, and for which, we hope and believe, he is now heartily ashamed. At any rate, he ought to be ashamed of them, and will be some time or other, if he is not now. During the last Christmas and new-year holidays Mr. Finn, in conjunction with the caricaturist Johnson, published a comic annual, which we thought quite flat, till we saw the English abortions of the same description. These last effusions certainly eclipse it in point of stupidity, (and this is saying a great deal,) being the dullest abominations that ever disgraced the press. We see that the publishers of the American Comic Annual have issued an advertisement, inviting communications for their next number, which they promise shall be got up in all respects with greater care and excellence. We dare say that Mr. Finn, with his usual sense and tact, will correct the most glaring faults of the last, and send into the world a work worthy of himself, his fellow-humorist, and the patronage of the public.

Mr. Finn enjoys the most unexceptionable private character, and his society is a good deal courted on occasions of public and private conviviality. He abounds in humor and good nature, is full of anecdote and fun, sings a good song, and is very apt to keep the table in a roar. We will wish him many years of life to laugh and to cause laughter, and with the wish conclude our present epistle.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—In behalf of the unfortunate barbers of this revolutionary age, I beseech you to say something in favor of the obsolete custom of shaving. What with the fashion of wearing whiskers all round the face, and the industry of certain gentlemen in Wall-street, we are likely to be all starved to death, unless we can get up a society for our relief among the whiskers. I think this is the least they can do for us, having, as it were, taken the bread out of our mouths. My shop is actually forsaken, and I might shut it up were it not for a few aspiring young gentlemen who come now and then to get shaved for whiskers. Alas! good sirs, what is to become of us all? We shall have to turn our razors into scythes, and sally out to mow meadows instead of beards. O, for the good old times when the swallows built in old men's beards instead of young ones.

Every Liverpool packet that arrives brings an enormous accession of whiskers, and sets our young boys agog to become fashionable. I don't complain of the wee-bit thin things that trip along Broadway with little whalebone switches about as thick as themselves—the only way they can possibly pass for men is by means of their whiskers. So they are to be pitied rather than blamed. I wish the custom-house officers would examine the muzzles of passengers before they come ashore, for I have good reason to believe that smuggling to a great extent is carried on under cover of these whiskers. I know one man who secreted three gold watches and a quantity of lace by means of his mustaches, and another who regularly smuggles large quantities of jewelry in the same way. I have also heard, from good authority, that several baboons and monkeys have landed without paying duty, being mistaken for whiskered christians.

If times don't mend soon there will be an end of all shavers, except those in Wall-street. I shall be obliged to turn broker unless I can get a comet to shave, or something of that sort. And if the barbers go, what will become of the surgeons, who are an inferior branch of our profession? If the young ladies now would only denounce these filthy abominations as anti-christian, as they certainly are, being borrowed from the Turks, there might be some hope; but I suppose they have enough to do to look at home, and learn to dance the gallopade. I should certainly die broken-hearted if it was not for a ray of hope that sometimes beckons me forwards with a smile, (I got this out of Paul Clifford) in the shape of a change of fashion. Ye powers who preside over the beards of men and comets, what a glorious harvest we shall have when mustaches shall be no longer the rage, and men cease to be ashamed to show their faces! How the prices of hair mattresses and sofas will fall, and the heads of the barbers rise! But alas! when will mankind be convinced, in the language of the immortal Huggins, that "man wants but little hair below, nor wants that little long."

I don't know that this letter will do any good, but at any rate there is comfort in complaining. I sign myself, in imitation of the great Partridge, yours, DOCTISSIMA TONSORUM.

N. B. I shall be happy to shave you gratis, Messrs. Editors, for a month, if you will only print this letter. If it happens to be considered clever, I don't know but I may turn author to keep myself from starving till times mend. Don't you think Sir John Falstaff's speech to Prince Henry—I go to the play sometimes—is a good definition of a whiskered gentleman? I forget exactly, but it's something about being "here apparent that thou art hair apparent," I believe. D. T.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I wear spectacles, am short-sighted, and one of the politest men in the world. Not being able to distinguish one face from another, I bow to everybody, for fear of offending my acquaintances by passing without knowing them. The other day I got a sort of a dim sight of what I supposed two or three ladies whom I know, standing in a window in Broadway, and began to bow according to custom. While I was paying my devoirs I heard a great explosion of a laugh inside the shop, whereat I was wroth, and approached to reprimand them for such ill-breeding, when, oh! the pangs of being near-sighted! I discovered by closer investigation, instead of three ladies they were three villainous stuffed corsets, such as are stuck up at some of the show-shops, in Broadway, as samples of the beautiful shapes that can be bought at the milliners. Since then I have offended one-half the ladies of my acquaintance by passing them without bowing, out of pure apprehension of being again taken in by stuffed corsets. Pray take your pen from behind your ear and point it at these vile imitations of heaven's last best work—the bust of a woman. Yours always, THADDEUS SECONDSIGHT.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH FOR THE MIRROR.

POT LUCK.

"WHAT, here already, my dear fellow? I began to be afraid you would not come."

"How, break my word to a college crony? I am incapable of it."

"To be sure you have not kept us waiting, it's hardly four o'clock. Juliana, come and receive the gentleman—and you too, mother. Why, where are you?"

Thus was I received by Bonnard, one of my friends, whom I was going to dine with for the first and last time in my life. I had lost sight of him for several years, but yesterday he pressed me so strongly to take a family dinner with him that I promised to do so, though I ran the risk of foregoing a delightful party in the Chaussée d'Autin. I regretted this, though I did not at the time know my host's character, still I made up my mind with a very good will, if not with a very good appetite. The devil take pot luck!

Juliana and the old lady did not make their appearance.

"They are doubtless preparing dinner," said Bonnard, shouting to them again at the top of his voice. The repeated barking of a dog, whose slumbers my arrival had disturbed, was the only answer. The animal got up from his corner and Bonnard from his seat—one barked, the other swore, and to crown the whole, to this tumult was added the coarse laughter of an individual in top-boots, who had not yet noticed me. This noisy overture was very disagreeable to me, and as mildness is in my opinion the best way of going to work with everybody, even dogs, I took out of my pocket a dainty, intended for the children, and presented this Sibyl's cake to my Cerberus. The whip itself could not have operated so powerfully. The animal ceased barking, jumped upon me, fastened his huge paws on my coat, and swallowed at a gulp the morsel thus diverted from its original destination.

"Look at that, Rousseau," said Bonnard, addressing our laughing friend. "How unfortunate; I'm certain he meant it for my little girl. Make Fidèle be still."

Rousseau went in search of a coachman's whip, and gave a whistle to summon before him the culprit, who thus disturbed in his digestion, dragged himself slowly along, with his tail and ears hanging down. The correction customary in such cases was inflicted on him not without fresh confusion, after which each of the parties returned to his place, the one in a corner, the other on a sort of bench. The tumult had aroused Juliana and her mother, who made their appearance, followed by two children. I paid my respects to my friend's wife and mother without being able to shake off the little ones, who twined round me like the serpents round Laocoon. Mr. Rousseau, who was what is called the friend of the house, jumped up:

"Well, what have we got for dinner to-day?"

"What have we got," answered Madame Bonnard, mysteriously; "you shall know, presently."

"Come, gentlemen," said the husband, with a frank and candid air, "this is a family dinner—nothing but pot luck. Do you, for your part, make yourselves perfectly at home."

"Oh," said the gentleman in boots, "I always make myself at home in an old friend's house." He said nothing more than the truth. "Besides," said he, "I've contributed my dish, a bottle of our country wine, grown in the Bourbonnais, which I assure you is not so bad. So much for the dessert."

"You are liberal, Mr. Rousseau," said the lady of the house, "but there is a dish of my manufacture at least as good as yours."

"What is it?"

"Guess—it's a dish—a dish of hash!"

"What! hash?"

And the countryman began rubbing his hands in glee and stamping on the floor with his iron-shod boots till the windows shook.

"Will dinner be ready soon, mother?"

"Yes, certainly, every thing will be ready soon. There's a dish of mine in it too, but I wish to surprise you."

The dinner was delayed half an hour longer, and I could see written on the cloth, as on the gates of the infernal regions, in Dante, "here there is no hope."

I filled the post of honor, opposite to Mr. Rousseau, who seated Madame Bonnard by his side, and my friend between his wife and mother; the two children had half the table to themselves. The neighboring kitchen sent its disagreeable emanations into the dining-room, and the coal smoke drew tears from all our eyes. The meagre side dishes argued no good, and when the tureen was uncovered the salt and watery bouillon was found to be nearly cold. I armed myself with patience, however, so far as to repeat the formula "no ceremony, just as if you were at home," and the repast commenced. During the first course Mr. Rousseau, who made pretensions to the character of a bel esprit, talked of himself at great length, gave me a grotesque description of his country-seat, his grounds, his hounds, and invited me to pass a month or two at his seat to see the wonders of the place. I excused myself the best way I could, and to escape from him proposed to taste the wine. My stomach was loaded with the warmed up bouilli of the day before. The devil take pot luck!

My eyes wandered round in search of a bottle "whose absence on its promise did lay blame," but alas! among the preparations for such an entertainment they had forgotten to go down into the cellar: we had no wine. The wife scolded, the mother, whose creed was economy, said nothing, Mr. Rousseau brought forward his Bourbonnais and seized the cork, but my friend opposed this heroic devotion and went down himself, while Madame Bonnard repaired to the kitchen and her lady mother to the pantry, and the two children drummed on the plates, made a harmonica of the decanter, and split my ears with their noise. There I remained tête à tête with Mr. Rousseau, the bouilli, the little rioters, and the side-dishes. I endeavored to excite by the help of pickles an appetite that was rather repulsed than exhausted, but they had only an insipid taste of raw cucumbers. I thought of making a second charge on the bouilli, but I found that the prudent mother had locked it up hastily in the sideboard, for fear of another attack. In utter despair I devoured the pretended fresh butter to keep myself in countenance. My friend at last made his appearance in a rage; he had gone down without a light, and nearly, as the song has it, "come tumbling down and broke his crown." He brought but one bottle with him, for the other had been broken on the way.

Madame Bonnard now arrived, marching slowly in with a huge dish of hash, the copious gravy of which overflowed the dish and stained the table-cloth.

"It's just pot luck," says she, "will you try some?"

I was about to plead that I had no appetite, but politeness was my destruction, and I, an epicure, took some hash!

"Try the wine, gentlemen, don't wait to be asked."

Madame Bonnard's advice was put in practice, and she herself officiously filled our half-rimmed glasses with their sour wine. I mixed a quantity of water with mine, though it had already as much as such a generous juice could well bear, and reflecting that sooner or later every dinner must come to an end, I consoled myself in the hope of a speedy deliverance.

"What is the matter with you, my friend, you don't eat?" said my entertainer.

A fearful tumult was heard all at once under the table, and on rising hastily and looking anxiously round, we found that the cat and Fidèle were fighting for the skinny carcass of a chicken. The females hurried to the kitchen. Their suspicions were but too well-founded—the roaster was empty. One of the contending parties had carried off the fowl, which the other wanted to share with him—hence the battle. Spits, canes, and whips were put in requisition, and passed from one to another. I more wisely laid hold of a decanter of water, and the two robbers thus inundated fled from the punishment they deserved. But the chicken, if it ever had been presentable, was no longer so, and it was transported to the pantry, in order not to give the culprits the benefit of their crime, or rather, for the next day's breakfast. For my own part, I could have wished that the whole dinner had met the fate of this unlucky fowl.

We resumed our seats at last, and I perceived to my great joy that my plate of hash had not escaped destruction.

"Well," said the friend of the house, "where is the dish you promised us, mother?"

"One moment, Mr. Rousseau," said the dame, "it is on the fire; you shall soon see a nosegay."

The countryman, who saw the table entirely vacant, gave free rein to his wit.

"Come, my friends, vive la joie! let us rise."

"Oh, by all means," said I hastily.

"Look, Bonnard," he resumed with his coarse laugh, "your friend is joking too. What, no more wine? Are you afraid of ghosts that you won't go to the cellar?"

"Curse that Rousseau," said I to myself with a sigh, "he'll dare him to it."

The host made a sign to his wife, who quitted us, and in ten minutes returned; a smell of sourcrot spread round, and this precious production of German industry declared open war to my olfactories. The mother followed close behind, bringing in a dish of eggs and tripe.

"There!" said she, proudly, "that's my favorite dish!"

To put the finishing blow to my sufferings a second bottle of vinegar, baptized wine by my host, was opened. Six o'clock and I had eaten next to nothing! In spite of myself, and for want of better, I had to undergo the sourcrot, the eggs, the vinegar, and Mr. Rousseau's compliments on my ravenous appetite.

Last came the desert, apples and a bit of cheese. A new adventure disturbed it. One of the children put his hand into the dish, like Judas, and in trying to lay hold of the fruit which caused our first parents' fall, upset the water decanter on me; whereupon, in spite of my entreaties, his grandmother inflicted on him that striking correction which is employed in schools to such advantage. But as every thing, even a bad dinner, must come to an end, we rose from table after two mortal hours, which seemed to me like two centuries. A walk and coffee, at my expense, assisted us to digest it, and I left this amiable circle swearing, too late, never to be caught in it again. The devil take pot luck!

LITERARY NOTICES.

The American Dictionary of the English Language. By Noah Webster. First quarto edition. Two volumes. S. Converse. New-York. 1828.

(THIRD NOTICE.)

THIS work is evidently acquiring the confidence of the American public. Through many difficulties, incidental to an effort towards reforming a language, it is making its way into colleges, academies, and other institutions of learning. Publishers, printers, and editors of literary journals have expressed their intention of adopting it as a standard; a testimonial of approbation subscribed by more than one hundred members of congress, among whom are Daniel Webster and J. S. Johnston, has appeared in the public prints; and a great number of letters from gentlemen and scholars, of the very first eminence in the United States, speak of it as in all respects superior to every other of the English language, and as destined to supersede all its predecessors. Whether or not the English will receive it as authority we do not know, nor can it be known at present; but many British journals have voluntarily borne the most flattering testimony to its superiority. The rules of spelling are particularly commended. Among these papers the Atlas, the Gentleman's Magazine, the Sun, the Aberdeen Chronicle, the British Journal, the Monthly Magazine, the Aberdeen Journal, and the Aberdeen Observer, are strongly in favor of its introduction as a standard. Many innovations upon the established systems of orthography and orthoepy will be perceived; but the decisions and opinions do not appear to be arbitrary or capricious. Valid and important reasons are furnished. These may not appear equally convincing to all, yet it should be observed that there are cases where, although nearly immaterial which mode is adopted, it is desirable to have the point distinctly settled. It would be impossible, without devoting several pages to the subject, for us to analyze all the claims possessed by Mr. Webster's dictionary, to rank above other similar publications; but there is a single point of syntax touched upon in the introductory remarks to his quarto edition, which does not seem to be understood with much uniformity by the majority of writers. It relates to the subjunctive form of the verb, as, if he be; if he have; if he go; if he stay; if thou write; whether thou see; though he fall; which, although generally used by the writers of the sixteenth century, Mr. Webster declares to have been, in a great measure, discarded before the time of Addison. Locke writes, "if these are;" Addison, "if the reader has a mind;" "if exercise throws off all superfluities, if it clears the vessels." Every observing reader must have remarked, that even the best authors are not consistent with themselves in the use of the tenses. Mr. Webster's reasoning upon the subject is clear and convincing. By his arrangement of the verb, a fact under condition, either in the present or past tenses, may be expressed by the indicative form, as, "if the man is honest he will return;" "if the ship has arrived." On the other hand, in speaking of a future contingent event, the ordinary auxiliaries shall or should may be used, as, "if it shall rain to-morrow."

Walker's dictionary contains thirty-eight thousand words, and the American edition of Todd's Johnson fifty-eight thousand. In the work now under consideration the number has been increased to seventy thousand. The addenda is composed of participles of verbs, terms of frequent occurrence in history, in law, and in the arts and sciences. The vocabulary has also been augmented by words of common use, which have escaped the notice of former lexicographers. Among these may be mentioned, as examples, grand jury, eulogist, mammoth, iceberg, parachute, safety valve, lithographic, missionary, to quarantine, electioneer, &c. There are many considerations which not only justify but render desirable this difficult and dangerous attempt to improve the character of our language, to simplify and fix the principles of orthography, to remove such errors as may be banished without injuring its structure; and to increase, as far as possible, its consistency and uniformity. The w and k are excluded from such words as honor and music. There are persons strongly opposed to all changes, which they deem innovations in language, and who question the advantage of attempting to purify it from its discrepancies and errors. They, however, mistake for innovations the results of the progressive spirit of improvement which has been at work upon our vernacular tongue since its earliest ages. Had our ancestors been of the same mind, it would now be in a state of confusion sufficient to form a very serious impediment to its extension, and to the advancement of the people by whom it is spoken. For instance, who will not acknowledge that in softening the old words dag, or dag, into day, gear into year, bugan into bow, and feger into fair, both harshness, obscurity, and unnecessary accumulation of letters have been cleared away.

As far as we have yet been able to examine, Mr. Webster has very judiciously employed the greater part of a long life in the most profound researches into the true origin and philosophical principles of language, and the result will undoubtedly be of the most extensive service to the cause of literature and science. The question of this work's authenticity, however, cannot be immediately settled. That it is not without defects, will not be denied by its author's best friends, as it is obviously impossible for a single individual to guarantee such a production from every inaccuracy. We deem, however, that the principle upon which it has been conducted is correct; and have little doubt that it will yet supersede the crowd of conflicting authorities which now bewilder the foreigner, who would become acquainted with the English, and which even perplex our own writers with contradictory opinions.

Museum of Foreign Literature, Science, and Art. No. XVI. New series. Philadelphia, E. Little: New-York, G. & C. & H. Carril.

This is an agreeable and popular magazine, containing spirited and interesting extracts from the best British periodicals, selected with taste and judgment. It is eminently superior to similar publications of the day, whose cheapness forms but a sorry apology for their insipidity and charlatanism. While the superficial observer suffers himself to be deluded by the ludicrous system of puffery to which a modest publisher is ashamed to resort, and consequently encumbers his-library with literary trash set off with gaudy ornaments, the intelligent reader will prefer a periodical like the present, where he is sure to meet "metal more attractive." We make room for part of the review, from the Athenæum, of Mr. Sprague's ode, pronounced before the inhabitants of Boston at the centennial celebration of the settlement of that city.

"This little poem has come rather unexpectedly into our hands, and we are well pleased to find it deserving sincere commendation. American literature has never yet had fair play in England. The Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews were and are essentially political engines—for years they carried on hostilities against American literature, in a spirit quite as angry and fierce as that with which the one nation warred against the other, and they have hardly yet learned that peace has been proclaimed. This, however, the Americans might have endured—these reviews were known to be state engines; it was known even in England, that they were influenced by what was felt to be political interests: but it was not to be endured that "little dogs and all" should come yelping after—that critics without political bias, and hardly affecting a critical judgment, should quietly pour out their affected scorn on American literature, and expect Jonathan humbly to submit to their partial judgment. Jonathan has no such spaniel blood in him—he kicked the curs in scorn, and characterized trading, time-serving, and ignorance as they justly merited.

"What, we would ask, could have been rationally expected from America that she has not done and exceeded? Are we to compare her infancy with our manhood? Are we to register against her, and to our own glory, the names of Shakspeare, and Milton, and Bacon, and the constellation of genius that has shed its lustre over our early literature—and forget that these men were the associates and the countrymen of the forefathers of the Americans, and that the fame of such names is as much their birthright and inheritance as ours? From the day of the declaration of her independence, America has done great and glorious things: she fought for liberty and triumphed—she devoted the whole of her young energies to the best purposes, the permanent happiness and well-being of her people; and they are thriving and happy—she took her armed station amidst the nations of the world, and maintained it—with peace she has advanced pari passu in the great march of human improvement—and the names of Irving, Cooper, Leslie, Newton, and others, are second only to the greatest in modern literature and art. But this is hardly a fitting occasion to enter on so comprehensive a subject, and therefore for the present we defer it.

"This ode, as will be seen by the title-page, was pronounced; it is therefore oratorical, rather than poetical, and must, we think, have been powerfully felt by the assembled company. To judge it comparatively, we should contrast it with anniversary odes in England—with addresses to Literary Fund Meetings, and the small weak stuff with which we are favored upon such occasions; but in truth such comparison would do us no credit."

After making some copious extracts from the poem, the Athenæum closes its remarks in the following manner:

"Now there may be, and there are, critical objections to some of the passages we have extracted, but, as a whole, they are full of vigor and deep feeling—there is little of that maudlin, slip-slop, conventional nonsense that so often passes current for poetry, and a great deal of manly and original thought."

THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

The exhibitions at the Park theatre have lately been quite attractive, and we are promised several additional novelties. Master Burke, whose performances delighted to the last, drew together an overflowing audience on the night of his benefit. Mr. Hackett at present occupies the boards. He has produced a new comedy, entitled the "Moderns, or a Trip to the Springs." It is an amusing trifle, and was favorably received. The scene of the school-room excited much merriment. The prize play, the "Lion of the West," will, we understand, be brought out on Monday evening next, for the benefit of Mr. Hackett. The manner in which this piece has been announced in some of the newspapers, with the most friendly intentions certainly, is, we think, calculated to excite expectations which will not be realized. It may, therefore, be proper to state, in justice to the author, and we do so at his request, that it does not aspire to the rank of a regular comedy. It was originally written with a desire to introduce Mr. Hackett to the public in a new character, and to aid in producing a taste for dramatic performances, founded on domestic incidents and native manners. The author had no idea of becoming a candidate for the prize offered by Mr. Hackett, but circumstances induced him to consent that it should take that course. Another error has likewise been propagated through the same medium. It has been stated, that the principal part was designed to represent a member of congress, somewhat noted for his eccentricities. The author disclaims such an intention. It is obvious that a character having any pretensions to be drawn from life must resemble somebody. Originals will be found in society approximating to it in many respects, yet differing in others; such was the character attempted in the "Lion of the West;" and nothing but a general resemblance to a certain class of men, whose peculiarities have, no doubt, been exaggerated, was aimed at.

Mr. Forrest, Mr. C. Kean, Mrs. Austin, and Miss Clara Fisher will successively appear, and Master Burke will probably close the season.

At the Bowery the "Water Witch" and the "Demoniac," (the latter by Mr. Stone,) have been performed with much success, and promise to have a long and profitable run.

The Chatham has been recently closed, for the purpose, as we are informed, of undergoing repairs. It will re-open the second of May, with a new company, under the stage management of Mr. Blake.

For the New-York Mirror.

"THERE'S A SILENCE THAT SPEAKS."

There is a voice that's silent as the gloom
That girts the waters of oblivion's lake;
As tongueless, but emphatic, as the doom
That did upon Belshazzar's vision break.
A voice that speaks the language of the tomb,
The palsied tremor—the arms nerveless shake,
The drooping form, the head of silvery gray;
Are silent all—but eloquent of decay.

The eye is eloquence: there glows a pyre
That sparkles with the essence of the soul,
Concenter'd there are all that can inspire,
And the warm feelings of the heart control.
A living iris: shadowed from the fire
That burns within the breast, while upwards roll
Its many-colored passions, till they blend,
And from the eye their vivid rays descend.

There is more power in the silent tear,
That like a dew-drop trembles in the eye;
More of that touching pathos we revere
In the soft breathing of the deep-drawn sigh;
There is a witch'ry, to the soul more dear,
In the deep stillness of an evening sky,
Than in the Grecian gesture, or the rules
Of all the rostrum eloquence of schools.

Ye who have watched the form of beauty kneeling,
Unburthening in prayer the soul's communion,
The eye upturned, a seraph glance revealing,
The red lip trembling with divine emotion,
The pearly tear adown the pale cheek stealing,
And heard the murmurings of that devotion,
Have ye not felt a fullness of the heart
That the strong words of passion ne'er impart?

Did there not fall angelic calmness there,
That bound the soul in heavenly embrace?
Did there not float, upon the balmy air
That bore the breathings of those words of grace,
A deep and holy spirit, that did bear
Soothingly sweet upon the heart, and trace
Upon its core, as with an angel's power,
The heaven-born deep devotion of that hour?

Cold, passionless, and dark must be the breast
That feels not, warms not with these still appeals,
With which the soul on every hand is blest,
From the bright rapture that the eye reveals,
When flush with health in beams of pleasure dressed,
And sunny hope across its azure steals;
To that which bears conviction, drear, and dread,
When the gaze lingers o'er the newly dead. C—n.

TO MY LITTLE SISTER JULIA.

Her forehead is a page, unwritten yet
With any gloomy fear, or dark regret;
Fragrant her breath, as breezes from the south,
And, formed for kisses, swells her faultless mouth.
Beneath the lashes of her azure eyes
Tears spring, as showers fall from April skies;
Till sweet and sunny smiles break through—and then
Those beautiful heavens clear away again.
Light of my thoughts! whate'er my fate may be—
To toil on land, or plough the lonely sea,
To linger, sad, beneath a distant sky,
In gloom to live, in solitude to die,
I never can forget thee—for thou art
Grown, like a second nature, in my heart,
And oft I strive, in fate's dark leaves, to trace
Some fortune for thee, gentle as thy face. A.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Our Country.—We advert occasionally to this theme with feelings of congratulation. Possessing a fair and rich division of the globe, with a population sufficiently large to produce an imposing effect upon foreign nations—uniting to physical means all those important advantages which spring from the union of an extensive commerce, an expanded and highly productive agriculture, the arts in a most flourishing condition, and learning and the sciences, those fountains of liberty, following in the train, with such an assemblage of efficient means, knowing that the states are yet in the gristle of manhood, we think we betray neither vanity nor egotism in saying that we have abundant cause for joy. Nor should we be unmindful of the pure and beneficent source from which flow so many and such inestimable bounties.

Perhaps nothing is so strongly calculated to impress the mind with a becoming sense of all these things, and to unfold to us the inestimable value of so many privileges as a reference to the calamities and still threatening condition of many parts of Europe. The comparison of our favored land and well-secured rights with those of other countries, cannot fail to beget a thorough conviction how infinitely superior are our advantages. The pictures indeed exhibit a striking difference. Whilst anarchy and oppression are seen to hold an almost undiminished sway abroad, we experience the benign effects of a free government and well-defined prerogatives at home. The people being the sole fountain of all power, have wisely interposed insurmountable barriers to the exercise of improper authority by their rulers. The duration in elective offices being short, no time is allowed for perfecting schemes in their nature adverse to free institutions. What, therefore, is lost in experience, is perhaps more than gained by keeping our halls of legislation pure. The only evils we have to dread, are those generated in the hot beds of faction, or emanating from the distempered brains of political aspirants—those who are not of sufficient weight or consideration to be called to office by the deliberate voice of the people, but who endeavor to accomplish their object by means of deep intrigue and stratagem. This is the enemy we have most to fear, and which we are called on to combat; and it requires incessant vigilance to restrain the dangerous spirit of party within discreet bounds.

The prospect which now presents itself to the contemplation of our countrymen, is one of more than ordinary brightness. Whilst many parts of Europe already feel the pressure of scarcity, and are threatened with heavy sufferings, our land teems with a profusion of all the prime necessities, as well as the luxuries of life. Our great staple, flour, bears a present price which will abundantly repay the husbandman for his toil and perseverance. It is believed that at no former period was there such a surplus of produce as is now in readiness for exportation. A vast increase of wealth must be the necessary consequence. Such have been the facilities, during the past winter, of conveying bulky articles to boatable streams that the granaries in every direction are said to be stocked almost to overflowing. Our vessels, which at this time have unrestricted intercourse with every desirable port in the world, are in readiness to convey these rich productions of our exuberant soil to whatever clime may hold out to them the hope of reward. A profitable and active commerce may therefore be looked for by the merchant, both at home and abroad. Our people, in the mean time, gathering increased strength, will continue to multiply their means as the nation continues its march unchecked on the high road to distinction and glory.

Philadelphia Gazette.—The editor of this paper is an old correspondent and a valued friend, and has, therefore, a perfect right to quarrel with our opinions whenever he thinks proper to do so. To the mysterious article published in the Gazette, on the eleventh instant, however, we cannot reply at all to his satisfaction. The observations to which he alludes are too obviously true for us to retract, deny, or explain away. But what has put it into his head that we are bound to "go all lengths with the journal" from which we extracted the remarks on Bulwer's poem? "Opinion is a matter of right," says he, "in the possession of every man." Why, then, does he blame us for honestly expressing ours, and fortifying it with that of a scholar and a critic?

Epitaph.—Sir Albertus Morton died in the prime of life; Lady Morton, from the effect of grief, only survived him a week. The following lines, from the pen of one of the best of the old poets, are engraved on the monument under which they repose, in Southampton church, England:

"He first deceased, she for a little tried
To live without him, liked it not, and died."

I HAVE KNOWN THEE IN THE SUNSHINE.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY—COMPOSED BY T. A. RAWLINGS.

Andantino.

I have known thee in the sun-shine Of thy beau-ty, and thy bloom; I have known thee in the sha-dow Of thy sick-ness, and thy gloom; I have loved thee for thy sweet smile, When thy heart was light and gay, But a-las! I loved thee bet-ter, When the smile had pass'd a-way.

SECOND VERSE.

When we first met, thou wert sporting
With the proud ones of the earth;
And I thought thee only made for
Nights of music and of mirth;
But thy virtues dwelt in secret,
Like a blossom that has furl'd,
All its sweet leaves from the notice
And the sunshine of the world.

THE CENSOR.

STRICTURES ON POETRY.

THE pervading character of our modern fugitive poetry is carelessness. The writer, as it gleams through his mind, catches a mere glimpse of the subject, which is consequently reflected just as imperfectly in his language. Hence, in the generality of pieces, we have a few fine ideas, visible among a host of pretty superfluous words and brilliant and inapposite images. The full and ample sense and thought, which should animate every part of a poem, and which insure immortality to the labored effusions of Pope, and other writers of his day, are, with few exceptions, unknown in the glittering sketches which are so apt to dazzle the eyes of the public. Some of the most popular productions, although sparkling with showy points, are full of admirably well-turned sentences, which mean absolutely nothing. We would instance a little effusion, widely circulated and much admired, from the pen of Mr. N. P. Willis, entitled "Better Moments." Thoughts really beautiful, and remarks destitute of signification, are crowded together without any arrangement. The first verse contains three errors:

"My mother's voice! how often creeps
Its cadence on my lonely hours!
Like healing sent on wings of sleep,
Or dew to the unconscious flowers."

The terminating words of the first and third lines, "creeps" and "sleep," do not accord in sound; the "healing sent on wings of sleep," conveys but an indistinct idea; and the word "unconscious," in the fourth line, indicates a point in the image which a more artful writer would have endeavored to conceal, instead of intruding it upon the attention. The force of the figure consists in the resemblance between the effects of the mother's voice, or, as he has it, the "cadence" of the voice upon his mind, and the influence of the dew upon the flowers, which, poetically speaking, should appear conscious of its presence. We pass over the use of the word "creeps," which, however it may be invested with a dictionary correctness, rather reminds one of a caterpillar than a sweet voice. Again:

"The book of nature, and the print
Of beauty on the whispering sea,
Give eye to me some lineament
Of what I have been taught to be."

Paraphrase this, and we are informed that "the print of beauty on the whispering sea and the book of nature always give me some lineament (i. e. some feature, form, or outline) of what I am by education." He means to say, that some beloved being who has passed away has pointed out to his youthful understanding the loveliness of nature, and taught him to admire it. But this whispering sea, and the book of nature, and the pretty but inappropriate word "lineament," which, although imported on purpose to rhyme with "print," but badly executes the author's intention—are obscure and crude, vox et prateria nihil.

"I have been out at eventide,
Beneath a moonlight sky of spring,
When earth was garnished like a bride,
And night had on her silver wing,
When all was beauty—then have I,
With friends on whom my love is flung,
Like myrrh on winds of Araby,
Gazed up where evening's lamp is hung;
And when the beautiful spirit there
Flung over me its golden chain,
My mother's voice came on the air,
Like the light dropping of the rain,
And resting on some silver star,
The spirit of a bended knee,
I've poured her low and fervent prayer," &c.

The fourth line is one of those volunteer flourishes of fancy which make novel-reading young ladies turn up their eyes in admiration; but what is meant by "night had on her silver wing?" (By the way, these wings flap about the regions of modern poetry on all possible occasions.) The second line assures us, in plain English, that it was a moonlight night; and we are not disposed to dispute the fact. This elegant incomprehensibility deserves to be laughed out of countenance, particularly when paraded in the composition of one capable of producing such admirable lines as occasionally occur in his verses; those, for instance, which we have italicized. The intelligent reader is bewildered in attempting to conceive how the "beautiful spirit," where the "evening's lamp is hung," could fling its golden chain over him. What "rests on some silver star," and what is the "spirit of a bended knee"?

The next verse is beautiful, and almost redeems the poem.

"I have been on the dewy hills,
When night was stealing from the dawn,
And mist was on the waking rills,
And tints were delicately drawn
In the gray east; when birds were waking
With a low murmur in the trees;
And melody by fits was breaking
Upon the whisper of the breeze.
And when the sun sprang gloriously
And freely up, and hill and river
Were catching upon wave and tree
The arrows from his subtle quiver," &c.

But the author strikes off again into confusion; hears thrilling voices on the "still and rushing light," and "creeping" (again) from silent glens; then bursting into tears, with his forehead pressed against the "wet grass," he rises up,

"The gay—the wild,
As humble as a very child."

NUMBER 43.

VIEWS OF THE CITY.

WE have the pleasure of offering to our readers, with the present number of the Mirror, a beautiful view of New-York, taken from Jersey city, and engraved in a style of the first excellence. On exhibiting it to an old friend of ours, who wears a cocked hat, and though carrying nothing sentimental in his dress or appearance, possesses more real feeling than three-fourths of the complaining bards of the modern school, he voluntarily offered to furnish us with some of the results of his antiquarian researches and early recollections. It may be supposed we gladly accepted this offer, when we apprise our readers that he is the same person who favored us with the articles illustrating the views of the little tiled cottage, and Knickerbocker-hall, in previous numbers.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

OLD TIMES IN NEW-YORK.

Old people, who outlive the fashions without losing the sensibilities of youth, are among the happiest of the universe. They enjoy a thousand pleasures, as harmless and as delightful as those of childhood itself; they have little to do in this world but look back on the past without regret, and forward to the future without apprehension. If it has pleased heaven to bless them with health and competency, and they are not subjected to the besetting sin of avarice, their days glide along smoothly; they take the enjoyments of life with a gentle zest, all nature administers to their satisfaction; and mankind revere and love them, because they join in their little pleasures, and partake in their rational amusements, in so far as smiles and sympathy may be called partaking.

It will seldom be found that old men talk for any length of time without at last making themselves the subject of their conversation. What they have seen and felt in days long past is the treasure whence they draw their resources of present content, and in detailing it they feel a sort of ideal superiority at being able to remember so much more than young people. I confess this is my foible; and the observations just made are intended for the express purpose of preparing the way for something of this kind, connected with my amusements and recreations.

Among the most charming of these is a ramble, in the spring of the year, ay and sometimes in the summer and autumn, along the banks of the Hudson, by Hoboken and Weehawk and the lofty rocks beyond. There is nothing in nature more beautiful than the scenery, both near and in the distance. All is fraught with life and beauty; the opposite shores are full of spires and houses, the river is all animated with boats; under your feet are little flowers peeping forth from among the rocks, and overhead the trees and buds. If you look from some projecting point towards the south, you behold the far-off entrance into the vast solitude of the pathless sea; and if to the north, the glorious course of the most majestic and picturesque of rivers, bounded on one side by undulating hills and dales, and on the other, by its perpendicular wall of eternal rocks.

If it should chance to be the latter end of May or the beginning of June, then all will be blooming and humming and chirping life in the groves and little patches of grass among the rocks. The one is filled with music, the other with fragrance; and when the twilight calm comes silently, and almost imperceptibly on, one can safely loiter long, and watch the parting day, as it sheds its tints of gold on the opposite groves of York island, and sets the windows in a blaze. On these occasions I have seen rich displays of nature's painting over earth and heaven. I have felt balmy breathings on my withered cheeks, and playing among my thin hairs; and heard rural concerts from the tree-tops, more grateful to me than all the delights of wealth, or the splendors of fame. I have at such times seen in the bosom of some crystal brook a little reflected world, more beautiful than ever poet described or painter drew, or than fancy ever feigned when she inspired her most favored offspring; whose tints no artist ever could equal, whose features no minstrel could ever describe; and I have heard the thrush or the mock-bird from the tip-top of some solitary tree discourse such exquisite music as, combined with the beauties of nature, and the inspiration of the scene and the hour, distanced the Italian opera, and threw the Signorina into the shade.

Next to these rural recollections, which I enjoy in secret and alone, with no other companion than the goddess who presides over the scene, one of my most ordinary recreations is rambling about this city, destined to be the queen of the west, noting its quick hasty progress, and watching the changes in its aspect and manners. Sometimes I stop in mute astonishment, to find that in the course of a few months, in which, by some chance, I have not visited a particular street, the old, low, homely little wooden houses—and, alas! that it should be so!—the triumphs of the architecture of mine ancestors—the sacred edifices, standing gable-end to the street, have all disappeared, while in their places have risen lofty palaces, four stories high; which, like the fabled erections of the eastern genii, seem to have risen up in a single night.

In no country are such extremes of time and space brought together as in ours; nor have such quick changes ever been exhibited to view. No where else has the life of one man presented such triumphs of industry and enterprise. Even I, though not yet old—that is, not very old—I am little more than three score—even I have lived to see the wilderness blossom like the rose—the haunts of wild beasts and wild men covered with harvests, houses, villages, cities. I have seen an empire, vast and almost boundless, peacefully emerge from the depths of interminable forests; and herds and flocks and prosperous people swarming over its once howling precincts. I have seen towns, not on the maps a score of years ago, become the capitals of great states that were not then in being; and cities arise out of little villages, aspiring to take precedence of the most renowned marts of the eastern world.

I contemplate these things with the feelings of an old man for a dear and single offspring, the full maturity of whose life he cannot live to behold. I say to myself, "I have no other child but thee, my country; and my affections centre in thy bosom. The future is full of anticipations of thy prosperity and happiness. Thy coming greatness dawns upon me in all my moments of thoughtful abstraction; and it is often a subject of serious mortification that I cannot live to see the full fruition of thy glories. I shall be dead and forgotten long before thy progress in arts, science, literature, and all thy peaceful triumphs in the empire of the human mind shall be consummated. But still I look forward with such a strong faith in what shall happen, as sure as the sun shines in the heavens, that the future may almost be said to be present already."

But the mind of man, most especially in his declining age, cannot support the burthen of enthusiasm for any length of time. I therefore almost always by degrees let myself down to the level of reflections of a more domestic every-day kind. My family, being somewhat in its decline, is naturally inclined to look to the past, and to cherish tradition; I am, consequently, full of particulars of times past, that have escaped the researches of history, which, like a sieve, retains only things of a certain magnitude. In addition to these, my own recollections furnish me with a clue to a comparison of the present with the past.

"Here," I exclaim, with even more enthusiasm than the classical antiquary feels among the ruins of Palmyra, Persepolis, or Rome; "here, where the merchants have reared their splendid habitations, once stood the renowned and impregnable fort George, which never opened its gates to a conqueror; partly because it never suffered a siege, and partly because it never had any gates to open. Here his majesty's puissant governor kept his state; and here the beautiful grandmothers of our still more beautiful belles set the fashion of admiring a red coat, which, unlike all other fashions of that day, still keeps its ground among us, to the desperate mortification of our young aspiring brevet-colonels, who, having no other foes to conquer, besiege the ladies' hearts. Here, on the eighteenth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and forty-one, happened that famous fire, which at length conquered this mighty strong hold, and reduced its wooden glories to ashes and oblivion."

Proceeding on at random I pause on the very spot, a little north of Trinity church, where was at that period a meadow, in which stood "Murray's haystack," the attempt to burn which was another circumstance that led to the detection of the famous negro plot, so little known in history, so renowned in tradition. I am in possession of a record of the whole transaction, from the robbery of Mr. Hogg to the execution of poor Ury, the catholic priest, who, together with those renowned wights, Cuffee Philisse, Cesar, York, and Prince Aubineau, fell victims, either to their crimes or the panic of the good people of the city.

Not far from this haystack, the only one I believe recorded in history, westward towards the river, was the house of John Hughson, a place of resort for blacks, and the very lowest orders of white men and women. Here it was said this plot to burn the city and massacre the inhabitants was first conceived and organized. It was the haunt of colored dandies; here they displayed their Sunday clothes and white teeth; and here was established the infamous "Geneva club," all the members of which were sworn to consummate their diabolical purposes. Amid the obscurity of the times, added to the prejudices and fears which prevailed at the examinations and trials, it seems impossible to tell whether such a plot had any existence but in the drunken dreams of some of the frequenters of Hughson's house; whether, in fact, it was the result of a groundless panic, originating in the frequency of fires about that time, reinforced by the contradictory perjuries of Margaret Sorubiero, alias Salingburgh, alias Kerry, commonly called the Irish beauty, and Mary Burton, spinster. The following is a short abstract of the discovery of this plot and its consequences, taken from a detailed official account in my possession.

On the night of the twenty-fifth of February, 1740, a robbery was committed in the house of Robert Hogg, a merchant of the city. It was traced to the house of Hughson, and a young girl, of the name of Mary Burton, who lived there, was brought up for examination. She pretended to be, or really was apprehensive of her life if she disclosed what she knew. She was, therefore, taken from Hughson, in whose service she was, by order of the magistrate. Hughson confessed the fact of some of the property stolen from Mr. Hogg being in possession of Peggy, the Irish beauty, but would not sign the examination. Peggy was committed for trial, and Hughson admitted to bail.

On the eighteenth of March, that same year, at one o'clock in the day, a fire broke out in the governor's house in fort George, which was burnt to the ground. A week after the house of Captain Warren, near the Long bridge, took fire, but was extinguished without much damage. "When the matter came afterwards to be canvassed," says the journal, "it was not altogether clear of grounds of suspicion that it was done designedly."

Wednesday the first of April following, there happened another fire at the storehouse of Mr. Van Zandt, at the east end of the town. "It was an old wooden building, with deal-boards and hay stored in one end of it, and the fire was said to be caused by a man smoking a pipe there, and setting fire to the hay. But it was said again, that the fire was first discovered in the north-east side of the roof before it had taken the hay."

Saturday evening, fourth of April, there was another fire at the house of one Quick. As the people were returning from this there was another alarm of fire "at the house of one Ben Thomas, next door to Captain Sarly, on the west side." On Sunday morning following, "it was discovered that some coals had been put under a haystack, standing near the coach-house and stables of Joseph Murray, Esquire, in Broadway. It was said there were coals and ashes traced from the fence to a house adjoining the stables, which caused suspicion of the negro that lived there."

These fires happening in such quick succession, and under such circumstances, caused a suspicion that they could not be the result of accident. This was corroborated by the following circumstance, which took place the day on which the coals were found under Mr. Murray's haystack. "As threenegroes were walking up the Broadway, towards the English church," says our journal, "about service-time, Mrs. Earle, looking out of her window, overheard one of them saying to his companions with a vaporing sort of air, 'Fire—fire—scorch—scorch—a little—d—n it, by-and-by.' The person that thus spoke was 'Mr. Walter's Quaco.'" This circumstance was communicated to a neighboring alderman, and by him to the justices at their meeting the next day.

On Monday the sixth of April there happened two fires, at the latter of which there was such evident proofs of its being the work of an incendiary, "that there was a cry among the people, 'The Spanish negroes—the Spanish negroes—take up the Spanish negroes.'" There had been some Spanish negroes brought in by Captain Lush, the prize condemned, and the negroes sold as slaves. Captain Sarly had purchased one of them, and as these two last fires happened next door to him, one on each side, and the last was so evidently the result of design, their suspicions turned on the Spanish negro, and produced the cry for the apprehension of the whole of them.

While the people were extinguishing the fire next to Captain Sarly's, there was another cry of fire, which drew most of them away, leaving but few behind. "A man who had been on the top of the house assisting to extinguish the fire, saw a negro leap out of the end window of one of them, and from thence making over several garden fences in great haste, which occasioned him to cry out 'A negro—a negro!' which soon improved into an alarm that the negroes were rising." This negro proved to be Cuffee Philipse, "a fellow of ill character. His master being a single man, and little at home, Cuff had a great deal of idle time, it seems, which he employed to ill purposes, and had acquired a general bad fame."

A general panic now spread through the whole city; persons in the neighborhood of these fires began to remove their goods; the common council met, and requested the lieutenant-governor to issue a proclamation, offering a reward of one hundred pounds and pardon; and, if a slave, freedom and twenty pounds to any who should inform against the supposed incendiaries. The lieutenant-governor accordingly issued his proclamation on the seventeenth of April. The same day Cuffee Philipse was interrogated, and though it was somewhat doubtful whether he was the person seen to leap out of the window during the fire near Captain Sarly's, it was thought proper to hold him in confinement to await further discovery.

On the twenty-second of April the supreme court convened, and Mary Burton, the young woman who had been in the protection of the magistrate since the expression of her fears on account of her testimony in the affair of the robbery at Mr. Hogg's, was examined before the grand jury. Her testimony for the first time went to establish the existence of a plot of the negroes, in conjunction with Hughson and his wife and the Irish beauty, to burn the whole city. The next day the Irish beauty underwent an examination, in which she solemnly denied all knowledge of the plot, and declared "that if she were to accuse anybody of any such thing, she must accuse innocent persons, and wrong her own soul."

About this time a letter was intercepted in New-Jersey, and sent to the common council of New-York, from Mrs. Romme to her husband, in which she says, "Vark's negro, he keeps his word steadfast for you." She advises him of the trial of Hughson and his wife, and enjoins him to keep out of the way. The third of May one Arthur Price, a servant of Captain Vincent, committed on a charge of having robbed his master's house, intimated to the magistrates that he had some important disclosures to make. He was brought before one of the judges, and deposed to various conversations with Peggy, the Irish beauty, in which she detailed some vague threats of vengeance uttered by several of the negroes in case Cesar and Prince, then in custody, should be punished, and that she was sworn not to say anything "about the fires." Just at this period the panic in the city was increased by the burning of seven barns at Hackensack, in New-Jersey.

The seventh of May, Peggy being examined in relation to her conversations with Arthur Price, made a confession, implicating Romme and his wife and several negroes in a plot "to burn the fort first, and afterwards the city, and then steal, rob, and carry away all the money and goods they could procure." "They were to carry these into the country, to be joined by the country negroes, and to return and perpetrate a general massacre of the whites."

The whole of this was denied by Mrs. Romme, the wife of John Romme. She acknowledged that Cuffee Philipse kept game cocks at their house, and that Cesar, Prince, and Cato came there sometimes to drink, but she neither knew or had ever heard of any plot to burn the city, or murder the white people. The several negroes implicated by Peggy were apprehended. Cesar and Prince were tried and sentenced to be hung, the former "on the island near the powder-house," the latter "in the city." "They were executed," says my account, "the day after the trial, according to sentence. They died very stubbornly, without confessing any thing about the conspiracy, and denied that they knew of it to the last."

The thirteenth of May was a day of public fasting and humiliation: the shops were shut, and "persons of all ranks resorted to their respective places of worship, and seemed deeply affected with a sense of the calamities by which they had been lately visited." The thirtieth of May, Quaco and Cuffee were executed at the stake, and confessed the plot, each accusing Hughson as the contriver of all.

The second of June, Hughson, his wife and daughter, together with Margaret Sorubiero, alias Kerry, commonly called the Irish beauty, were brought to trial, all found guilty, and sentenced for execution the twelfth of June, the former in chains. The eleventh of June, Bastian, a condemned negro, confessed the plot in open court. Cesar was to be king, and Hughson ruler over all. The same day Hughson's daughter was reprieved till the nineteenth. The next day Hughson and his wife and Margaret Kerry were led to execution. Their appearance and behavior are thus described:

"The sheriffs observed John Hughson, when he was brought out of jail to be carried to execution, to have a red spot on each cheek, about the bigness of a shilling, which they thought very remarkable, for he was always pale of visage. These spots continued all along to the gallows. Amongst other discourse it seems he had said 'he did not doubt some remarkable sign would happen to him, to show his innocence.' He stood up in the cart all the way, looking round as if he expected to be rescued, as was conjectured by many from his manner. One hand was lifted up as high as his pinion would admit of, and a finger pointing, as if intending to beckon.

"At the gallows his wife stood like a lifeless trunk, with a rope about her neck tied to the tree. She said not a word, and had scarce any visible motion.

"Peggy seemed much less resigned than the others, or rather unwilling to encounter death. She was going to say something, but the old woman, who, being next her, gave her a shove with her hand, as was said by some, so Peggy was silent.

"But they all died, having protested their innocence to the last touching the conspiracy."

It would exceed the limits of this article to relate all the succeeding particulars of this singular affair; and the prevarications of Mary Burton, who deposed one day to what she contradicted the next, until, in the judgment of posterity at least, she became unworthy of belief in any case, much more one of life and death. Several persons suffered, principally in consequence of her testimony, and she finally received a reward of one hundred pounds from the authorities of the city. That such a plot was talked of and agitated, if not actually organized, and that many of those who suffered were guilty at least of arson I have little doubt. But there was one man who unquestionably fell a victim to the stern bigotry and intolerance of the age.

From the supposed agency of the Spanish catholic negroes in these fires, religion became in some measure a party to the conspiracy; and the attorney-general frequently took occasion to allude to a design on the part of the pope and the Spaniards to burn the principal cities in the British provinces. In the ferment of mingled fear and religious antipathy combined, an unfortunate catholic priest, named John Ury, was accused of instigating and participating in the plot of burning and massacre.

He was accused by a certain carpenter, who heard him preach, and deposed that "the drift of his sermon was against drunkenness and debauchery of life, and against deists; that he blamed the preachers of the city for their preaching up that faith without works was sufficient for salvation. He said this was destroying two grand attributes of God Almighty, justice and mercy, and that there must be good works."

These unheard-of blasphemies against the calvinism of the honest Dutch jury proved most probably fatal to poor Ury, by disposing them to put implicit faith in the vague testimony of suspicious witnesses, and misinterpret his most innocent actions. He was convicted and executed. His deportment on his trial, in prison, and at the place of execution, as described, even by a writer evidently believing in his guilt, has often called forth the sympathy of the author of this sketch, and brought the tears into his eyes, although an orthodox episcopalian; and his last dying declaration seems to him to be one of the most eloquent as well as solemn and affecting on record. It is as follows:

"Fellow-Christians—I am going to suffer a death of pain and ignominy, a death accursed of all mankind. But it is the cup my heavenly Father has placed in my hands, and I drink it in willing submission to his will. It is the cross of my Redeemer, I bear it with pleasure, well knowing that all who live in Jesus Christ must suffer persecution. We must partake in his sufferings before we can share the glories of his resurrection. For he went not up to heaven before he ascended Mount Calvary, nor did he wear the crown of glory before he wore the crown of thorns. I am now about to appear before an awful and tremendous God—a being of infinite purity, unerring justice—too wise to be deceived, too just not to punish the attempt. Now this is the being at whose bar I stand. In the presence of that God, the possessor of heaven and earth, the dispenser of life and immortality, the avenger of falsehood, I lift up my hands and eyes fearlessly, and solemnly protest I am innocent of what is laid to my charge. I appeal to the great Being who holds the earth, the waters, and the heavens in his hand—who looks through the hearts of all his creatures, for my entire ignorance of Hughson, his wife, or the wretched woman who was hanged with them. I never knew them, living, dying, or dead; nor ever had any knowledge or confederacy with black or white in any plot. Upon the memorials of the body and blood of my dearest Lord, in the creatures of bread and wine in which I have commemorated the love of my dying Savior, I protest that the witnesses are false ones. I never knew or saw these perjured witnesses but at my trial. But to remove all scruples with regard to my faith, and the truth of this my testimony after my death, I shall give my thoughts on some points."

After attesting his belief that it is not in the power of man to forgive sin, and that those who pretend to do it, commit the sin against the Holy Ghost, he proceeds:

"I solemnly attest and believe that a person having committed or imagined crimes that might have proved hurtful or destructive to society, and who does not avow the whole scheme, and all the persons concerned with him, cannot obtain pardon from God; for it is not the taking of oaths that ought to deter him from confessing his guilt and that of others, such obligations being not only sinful, but unpardonable if not broken. A person firmly believing this, standing like me on the brink of an eternal life of suffering, if he shall lie with his last breath, and knowing his future state must depend on the performance or neglect of these duties, cannot, dare not trifle or prevaricate.

"I have no more to say by way of clearing my innocency, knowing that to a true, unprejudiced christian mind I must appear guiltless. But I am not very solicitous about it. I rejoice, and it is now my comfort in this last hour of mortal life, that my conscience speaks peace to me, now that I am going from a world of sorrow to a region of bliss, where there are no plots and no perjured witnesses thirsting for innocent blood, and where, blessed be God! the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.

"But least any serious christian should arraign the providence of God, in thus suffering the innocent to be slain like helpless lambs in the slaughter-house of the butcher, I, even I, will bear testimony that these are the dark dispensations of a being who is all wise and cannot do wrong, who is all merciful, and will not suffer the guiltless to perish in vain.

"And now I depart this waste and howling wilderness, with a mind serene and free from all malice, hoping forgiveness, bequeathing forgiveness to all, and praying that Jesus, who alone is the giver of repentance, will convince, conquer, and enlighten the souls of my murderers, who have borne false witness against me, that they may publicly confess their wickedness, and even though late, do justice to my injured memory when dead."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The works of Cowper and Thomson, including many letters and poems never before published in this country, with a new and interesting memoir of the life of Thomson. Complete in one volume. Philadelphia: J. Grigg. 1831, 8vo. p. 537.

This valuable work is elegantly printed, and issued at a moderate price. The "letters and poems never before published," will impart to it an additional value; and although the public are too well acquainted with the rare merit of these standard writers to render any strictures upon their works necessary, we cannot refrain from praising the neatness with which the publisher has prepared this edition. The volume is ornamented with a delightful frontispiece, and approaches nearer the excellence of the English style than the generality of similar American publications. Too little attention has been paid to the manner of reprinting the standard works of the British authors. We are pleased to observe that more care has lately been devoted to the subject; and of the enterprising publishers who have led the way, Mr. Grigg stands among the foremost.

Our Neighbourhood, or Letters on Horticulture and Natural Phenomena: interspersed with opinions on Domestic and Moral Economy N. York: E. Bliss. 1831. 12mo. p. 332.

The sinners and ignoramuses, of which many authors take it for granted that the world is composed, betray such a wilful aversion to moral and scientific instruction, that the sager and more virtuous part are compelled to resort to ingenious expedients to surprise them with a lesson or a sermon, which they receive as a child swallows physic, in sweetmeats. In this volume, there are some good directions relative to gardening and other branches of rural economy, conveyed through the medium of much detail, less interesting in itself than the information which it is intended to render palatable. The sketches of private life and family circumstances, although apparently modeled on the style of Miss Mitford, are totally unsupported by the judicious selection of incidents—the easy and singular power of graphic description, so charming in the delightful delineations of "Our Village." An ordinary writer, casually witnessing some striking event, or sublime scene, in the artless language of nature with which his excited imagination will supply him, may impart a degree of interest to his relation; but it requires a great poetic talent to fling a charm about mere every-day people and occurrences. The inexpressible archness and grace with which this has been accomplished by Miss Mitford, throws the tame ordinary characters, and tedious trifles of the present publication altogether in the shade. The author seems to forget that what is quite agreeable and interesting to one's self, in the routine of private life, is not sufficiently important to be printed in a duodecimo, and paraded before the world. As letters to a friend, who would naturally peruse them with partiality, or even as a private journal, "Our Neighbourhood" might be well enough to be admired by the parties figuring therein; but Mr. Allen, Mr. Allen—think of three hundred and thirty-two mortal pages of unentertaining, and, too often, uninteresting matter, inflicted upon us innocent citizens—about persons and places we dare not cherish a hope of beholding this side the river Styx! We quote a portion of the ninth letter, as a fair specimen of the principal part of the work:

"We are really grateful for a rainy day in the country, for while the sun shines we are very busy out doors with the plough and spade, and in preparing for winter. In consequence, a number of little, and yet very important matters, are left to accumulate until a rain drives us under shelter. Three days of incessant rain have brought us up again, and now there stands a goodly row of sharp tools, sound rakes and mallets, as well as some well-shaped axe and hammer handles. If it be a clear day to-morrow, we are to kill our hogs—six fine ones of the no-bone breed, and only eight months old. Peter acts as master of ceremonies, and has invited his neighbor, Brom, to assist us, promising in turn to go over to him when he is ready. Brom is Dr. Bentley's man. My little Sam is as knowing at it as his elders; and poor Dennis, as is the case with all that occurs, is giving his opinion with great fluency, but really knowing nothing of the matter.

"Peter came to me last evening to unburthen himself. 'I do not wish to injure the man, Master, but he will certainly make all go wrong. He killed his own pig at his own house last week, and such a poor disfigured thing I never saw. He has left half the bristle on, and it hung all lopsided for the want of a gamble.' 'A gamble, Peter, what is that? I fancy that I am no wiser myself than Dennis on the subject of gambles.' 'Why a gamble, Master, is a piece of stick, sharpened at both ends, to keep the feet of the hogs spread out. But cannot you set him at work at something else? Has Master no more beans and peas to shell?' said the black, grinning."

And again:

"We went into a noble pantry, or rather store-room, filled with preserves and pickles, cheese cakes and eatables of all sorts—in fact there was abundance throughout, and all so conveniently placed, so clean and so fresh that I was tempted to eat slice after slice of the cold tongue and turkey, and pumpkin-pies; nor could I resist the pressing entreaties to eat 'only one piece of plum-cake, and then just to taste the gooseberry-wine.'"

Now far be it from us to speak disrespectfully either of "cold tongue and turkey" or "pumpkin pies," or to insinuate any thing against the adroitness with which Peter brought the existence of that innocent and much-abused animal alluded to above, to a melancholy and premature close; but we would suggest that these things cannot be generally interesting. There is too much chaff to compensate the reader for the grains of wheat, of which, we must in justice confess, the work is not entirely destitute. The preface affords the reader grounds to hope that this is to be succeeded by two other similar volumes! We take the liberty of requesting the author to eat his pies in future behind the scenes, to kill off the principal part of his dramatis personæ, who appear rather odd and out of place, thus going through the simplest actions and conversations of their lives, in the broad glare of public observation; and particularly to compress his views on horticulture, and place them more immediately in the reader's possession. The public, to be sure, is an indolent person, rather fond of his own ease and pleasure; but we will venture to be his surety that he will bear all the real information upon rural economy, with which Mr. Allen's experience has enriched his mind, without the aid of the in-door sketches of character, or any other sly artifice to enlighten his mind by amusing his fancy.

THE FINE ARTS.

THE PAINTINGS OF COLONEL TRUMBULL.

THE exhibition at the gallery of the American Academy of the Fine Arts, in Chambers-street, is rendered interesting by the fact that all the productions, including nine subjects of the American revolution, with near two hundred and fifty portraits of persons distinguished in that period, are painted from the life by a single individual. The merits of Colonel Trumbull as an artist have been so frequently canvassed as to render, at this time, any opinion respecting his talents unnecessary: especially as it is well known that in 1816 the government of the United States passed a resolution authorizing him to execute four subjects for the nation. These were completed in a manner which gave general satisfaction; and, if we mistake not, adorn the rotunda in the capitol at Washington. Of them, four pieces in the present collection are miniature duplicates. The principal paintings which claim the attention of the spectator are the battle of Bunker's Hill, the death of General Montgomery in the attack on Quebec, the Declaration of Independence, the capture of the Hessians at Trenton, the surrender of General Burgoyne, the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, and the resignation of General Washington. The interest of these pictures is much heightened by the circumstance of their being original likenesses. The American cannot look upon the representations of these important events without feeling a throng of spirit-stirring associations crowd upon his mind. From these originals several fine engravings have been executed, which many of our readers must have frequently seen, as they have been widely disseminated and much admired.

Although, however, Colonel Trumbull has devoted a very large portion of his life to paintings illustrative of the events of the American revolution, he has not confined himself to them exclusively. We have, among many additional pieces, copies of celebrated pictures of the old masters, landscapes, waterfalls, &c; besides numerous miniature heads of distinguished persons done in oil.

It is to be hoped that our citizens will not disregard the present opportunity of compensating the venerable and industrious artist for so many years of laborious exertion, in illustrating prominent periods in the history of his country.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

ESTRANGEMENT.

BY MISS ELIZABETH BOGART.

THOU too, e'en thou, the changeless one, thro' years' vicissitudes,
Hast bowed at length to fickleness, with earth's vast multitudes.
Thy heart has mingled with the world, its passions and its pride,
And stern collision, mind with mind, thy hidden powers has tried;
And in thy intercourse with men, its rivalries and fears,
Thou hast of little import deemed the friendship of past years.

Well, be it so—and may'st thou find the busy scenes of life,
The spirit-stirring warfare, and the deep commingling strife
Of men's pursuits, a recompense for the more quiet things,
The softer, sweeter joys, to which the heart of woman clings.
And may'st thou find ambition's path, a bright and pleasant way,
Nor e'er regret, in after-life, what thou hast cast away.

Go, then; I feel that thou art changed—the sign is on thy brow—
Its cold expression as I gazed in silence even now.
I cannot brook that altered look; we must not meet again—
We've come to the diverging point, where breaks the social chain
Of feeling's union, and we part—unbiased to pursue,
Each one, alone, the chosen path, the distant goal in view.

It is not that the thought was mine, e'en in the future far,
That e'er our destinies could form beneath one guiding star.
I never sought to win thy love, in that absorbing sense,
Which speaks of perfect union, and of perfect confidence.
I never dreamed that thrilling word, howe'er it be defined,
Applied to thee and me; or swayed the thoughts of either mind.

'Twas but the spirit's friendship, and opinion's interchange,
That e'er a moment came within imagination's range.
I miss thy bright, approving glance, or thy reproving smile,
In gentleness and kindness given, effectual too, the while.
I miss thee in the trifles of which happiness is made,
And in the more momentous scenes, where life is all display'd.

I would forget, if wish were will, all thou hast been to me;
But how when each familiar thing still speaks to me of thee!

How can I mix in fashion's throng, amidst each gay delight;
Or walk beneath the moon-beams, or the watching stars of night;
Or sketch with fancy's graphic power the home-scenes of the heart;
Nor see thee in each picture still, all altered as thou art?

But go—thy way is in the world, the rising-place of men,
The mart of deep, contesting thoughts, borne on the lip and pen.
Not in green fields, or smiling vales, or some loved solitude,
But where thick clashing interests meet, and jealousies intrude.
Amidst the hurry of the mind, the sick heart's weariness,
The strange excitement of the nerves, as hopes too wildly press.
Go, bear thy part in the vain strife—it is thy destiny—
While I must grieve that for such things thou art estranged from me.

ODE TO FRANCE.

BY JAMES NACK.

Queen of the world! canst thou forget
That lofty name was thine;
Or, if it be remember'd yet,
Must thou that name resign?
The nations that were once thy slaves
Are they thy masters now?
And when a foreign sceptre waves,
Must thou before it bow?
And must thy once exalted throne,
Degraded now, receive
A king, in name a king alone,
Who dares not for a moment do
A manly deed, that might pursue
His country's wishes, or his own,
Till Europe's despots give him leave?
Oh France! Awake!

Awake! I know thou wilt! Though deep
As death's, thy lion-spirits' sleep,
There is a name whose whisper'd breath
Can start thee from the sleep of death!
It little needs that I should tell
That name, of earth the mightiest spell;
Look in thy heart, and read the name
Most cherished there—the name of him
Who found thee sunk in crime and shame;
Thy strength decay'd, thy glory dim;
Who plying heard thy hopeless groans,
And raised thee by his giant might;
Who piled a pyramid of thrones,
To place thee on the sun-crown'd height.
Who rent away the brightest gem
From Europe's every diadem,
For thee, Oh France! to wreath thee all
In one resplendent coronal,
And bind its glories on thy brow—
What wast thou then? what art thou now?
Oh France! Awake!

Awake! Look up!—What means thine eye?
The spoils of Austerlitz,
Upon whose column, towering high,
A mighty phantom flits;
With melancholy glance, and stern,
His awful eyes upon thee turn,
While pointing to the sculptured name
Of all his hundred fields of fame!
Behold thy veterans faltering by,
And at that trophy of thy shame,
The trophy of thy glory erst
Their hearts with indignation burst,
And on the spot they die!
They die! it rather were a sight
To call the dead to life,
And pour them from their graves, to fight
Again in sternest strife!
They die! and thou—art thou not dead?
Or why so low reclines thy head?
Oh France! Awake!

Awake! Oh soon shalt thou awake,
And from thy throne the puppet shake;
Whose power, as conscience tells him, springs
But from the grace of foreign kings,
From whom he must receive, with awe,
For thee and for himself the law!

Thy children shall in arms arise
Around thy chosen one,
The star of all creation's eyes,
The lord of battle's son!
Though Europe's tyrants shall combine
To war with the imperial line,
And bid thee at their hands receive
A master from the race abhor'd,
Their purpose they shall not achieve
While thou hast yet a sword!

Remember that thou art not free
While foreign kings dictate to thee!
Then onward—onward to the fight!
Assert a nation's dearest right,
To heed no choice, except her throne,
For him who shall ascend her throne!

Though millions shall that right oppose,
In vain the number of thy foes!
The spirit of thy lord of war
Shall stalk thy stern array before;
Thy foes shall feel its secret power,
And in its awful presence cower!

Nay—were thy foes with conquest flush'd,
And thou beneath their numbers crush'd,
Oh then if one should breathe the spell
By them and thee remember'd well,
That sound, as awful to their ear
As that, which sent at dead of night
From heaven, compell'd Assyria's might,
Shall paralyze their souls with fear!
Thy dying shall forget to die,
And start again to arms;
The victors shall before thee fly
In agonized alarms,
While thunders every ear upon
The shout of "Vive Napoleon!"

BEGGARS.

A beggar once a glided courtier met,
And greeted him with "Welcome, brother;"
Which made the other fume, and swear, and fret,
And make a mighty noise and pother.
"Pooh!" cries the sturdy beggar, "good Sir Luce,
What mighty difference can you see
Betwixt a man, like you, who begs a place,
And one that only begs a bone—b-b-e-e!"

TIME AND TRUTH.—AN APOLOGUE.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

AMONG the daughters of Time, the youngest and best beloved, was a beautiful maiden, called Truth. It was foredoomed at her birth that she should be incapable of fraud or deception; that wherever she came she should remedy the evils of falsehood and calumny, put to flight forever the errors of mankind, and banish doubt, darkness, and uncertainty from the face of the earth. In short, she was to be omnipotent and eternal.

Time, who was forever in motion, and never staid a moment in one place, could not endure to be without the society of his favorite child, and as soon as she grew up, insisted on her accompanying him every where. Being about to make the circuit of the universe, he accordingly took her by the hand, and they journeyed together.

Time had wings, but Truth had none; and it was soon found she could not keep up with the old man, who, though his head was almost bald and his beard white as the driven snow, could travel day and night, over hill and dale, sea and land, through air and fire, without ever resting or being fatigued. Impatient of delay, and incapable of restraining the impetuosity of his motions, he soon grew tired of the slow and feeble steps of his daughter, who was timid as a young fawn, and looked about, before, behind, on every side ere she ventured forward; and telling her he could not wait for her tardy motions, bade her join him without fail at the end of the world.

Time soon finished his tour round the globe, but Truth was far behind; and as he had sworn never to wait for any one, the old man turned round to make another tour, and met his daughter about half way on her journey. As long parted friends love to tell each other all that has passed in their absence, they related their adventures.

"One day," said Time, "I met a wife whose rash husband had turned her from his door and divided her from her children, on account of some unfounded jealousy. I would have stayed to make up the quarrel and convince him of his error, but I knew you would soon come and set all right. I hope thou didst make my words good. Didst thou interfere in behalf of one of thy sex?"

"Alas! father, the poor abandoned wife was dead before I came. Grief and shame had driven her to despair, and she perished by her own hands."

"What a pity! but let us go on. Next I met a young man who had been crossed in love in consequence of calumnies that had poisoned the mind of his mistress. A little onward and I encountered the young woman herself, who was pining away almost broken-hearted at the supposed infamy of her lover. I could not stay to remedy their sorrows, but told them my daughter Truth, was just behind, and would soon bring about a good understanding."

"Alas! alas!" cried the maiden, with tears in her eyes, "I came too late. The youth had become a sot and a gamester, and the poor girl had died of a broken heart."

"Thou art destined, it seems, to be always too late. I wish thou wouldst go forward instead of looking all round, and feeling thy way like a blind man."

"Ah! father," replied she, "how should I be assured of being always right if I did not first see which way I was going?"

"Next," continued old Time, "I came into a city where a man had been condemned to death for a crime of which he was innocent. I would have stayed to do him justice, but my moments were too precious, and I knew you were close at hand. Didst thou save him from the gallows?"

"No—I did not arrive in season. I saw his body hanging in chains; but I did justice to his memory. Better late than never, father."

"Humph!" said the old man. "After this I arrived in a country where the people were preparing to murder their governor and all his family on account of a false report of his having attempted to betray them to their enemies. I looked behind, and thought I saw thee advancing, and being, as usual in a great hurry, left it to thee to dissipate the delusion."

"I grieve to tell thee, O father! that I was a little too late. The virtuous governor, with all his family, had just perished, and the wicked calumniator was in his place. I told them the true state of the case. But the lie had done its work, and the consequences were irremediable."

"I wish to the immortal Jove, cried Time, "I wish my youngest daughter Truth, would keep pace with my eldest daughter Falsehood!"

"How should I, my father, when she never stops to see whither she is going, and I am always seeking the true path?"

"Proceeding onward," resumed old Time, "I came to where the people were fighting, and cutting throats, and burning each other on account of a dispute about a word, which each party interpreted differently. I thought it a great pity they could not find out which was the right meaning. But, said I, my daughter is just behind and will clear up the matter, I have not a moment to lose. I hope thou didst not come too late here as elsewhere."

"Not altogether too late, father," replied the virgin, "but ere I came one party had exterminated the other; and when I offered to tell the conquerors the true meaning of the word, they said they knew it already as well as I did. I asked them how they came by it; they answered by virtue of the right of the strongest, and then left me shouting 'Truth is great and will prevail!'"

"Poor, ignorant creatures!" exclaimed Time, and shrugged his brawny shoulders. "As I travelled onward from thence, I came to a nation which sacrificed human beings to a great snake, and left particular directions with the priests to stop you when you came, and become convinced of their deplorable errors."

"I stopped; but I grieve to say it was only to lament over their misfortunes. The day before I arrived they had all been exterminated by a people who came to convert them."

"Sluggard!" exclaimed the old man, for he began to wax wroth. But he again resumed his narrative.

"A little while after I came among a people who worshipped graven images, and was exceedingly angry at their foolish idolatry. But I could not stay to argue the matter with them, and proclaimed aloud, as I passed, that my daughter was coming to set them right. Didst thou visit these ignorant people?"

"I did—but alas! father, the very day but one before I came they had all been swallowed up by an inundation!"

"Out upon thee!" cried Time, no longer able to restrain his impatience at the dilatory pace of his daughter. "Out upon thee! Of what use is it that thou art gifted with the power to correct error and remedy the mischiefs of calumny—of what consequence is it thou shalt ever prevail where thou comest if thou art thus always lagging behind the events which I bring about? Better not come at all than too late."

"Father," replied the weeping daughter, "it is not that I am too slow, but that thou art too swift. Remember that heaven hath given thee wings, and vigor to pursue an eternal flight, while the feet of thy poor girl are tender and her limbs slow of pace. If thou wouldst only slacken thy speed a little, I might always keep up with thee, and—"

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the old man, testily, "I have not a moment to waste in hearing you talk."

So saying, he spread his wings, shook his hour-glass at her in anger, and vaulted forth on another journey round the world. His daughter ran after him as fast as she could, and entreated he would stop; but though she has ever since been trying, she has never been able to overtake the flight of Time. Those who know best, however, affirm that she will undoubtedly catch him at last, for "Truth is great and must prevail."

ITALIAN LITERATURE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF EMINENT CHARACTERS.

LUDOVICO ARIOSTO.

THIS distinguished writer showed from his earliest years all the characteristics of a poet; a roving, unsettled disposition, fond of literary leisure, and averse to the anxiety and application of business. Poverty alone forced him to become industrious, and he entered the service of the Cardinal d'Este, as a sort of secretary. While in his employ, and at the age of thirty-one, he commenced the Orlando Furioso, on which he spent eleven years, and which appeared in 1516. The popularity of this work on its first publication was astonishing. More than sixty editions were published in the course of that century; and a contemporary says there were more copies of the Furioso in Italy than there were of Homer and Virgil. The Cardinal d'Este alone seems to have grudged him his popularity. The poet left him to attach himself to the duke of Ferrara. This prince gave him the superintendence of his theatres; and in his employment Ariosto, who had too much of the courtier in his character, was glad to pass the remainder of his life. His patron's scanty bounty he acknowledged by the grossest flattery of him and his family; and the fulsome panegyrics he pronounced on the house of Este, in the Orlando Furioso, immortalize the disgrace both of the sycophant and his master.

His great work is the Orlando Furioso. Voltaire said of it that he always hurried through it as fast as possible, to have the pleasure of commencing again; and the same compliment is paid to it by almost every reader. It is the history of the Paladins at the court of Charlemagne, their amours and adventures. There is, however, no pretension to unity of plan. Though the madness of Orlando has given name to the work, it is merely an episode, and does not occur till the twenty-third canto, the middle of the poem. It is, in fact, a continuation of the Orlando Innamorato of Berni, beginning where that leaves off, without preface or explanation. Ariosto imitates Homer in the abruptness as well as in the spirit with which he enters upon his subject. He rushes at once into his field of action, without preparation for egress. When his characters are crowded on his hands he is not puzzled, like Madame de Scudéri, how to "kill the king or marry the queen," he leaves all in confusion, and enters upon another theme, which he gilds, adorns, and confounds in the same way. He leads his hearers sometimes over rough and sometimes over barren spots; they are sometimes bewildered by the intricacy, sometimes wearied by the length of the way; often provoked, yet always pleased with his vagaries. We relish even while we condemn his whims and caprices, like grave age shaking its head, yet smiling at the follies of the frolic blood, and high spirits of youth. All his creations are dreams of fancy, without definite form or object. We receive no useful lessons of wisdom or prudence; we see no examples of practical, everyday virtue; we move in a world devoid of the charm of human interest, but abounding in "cloud-capt towers and gorgeous palaces." His is that world of poetry and romance, "so dazzling to the dreaming boy," so enticing, we may add, even to grave wisdom and gray-haired eld; where love and honor are the only laws, where brilliant accomplishments are the only virtues, filled with all that can idly amuse or pleasingly deceive us. It is like Phantastic's chamber in Spenser,

"disappointed all within
With sundry colors, in the which were writ
Infinite shapes of things dispersed thin;
Some such as in the world were never yet,
Ne can devised be of mortall witt,
Some daily seen and known by their names,
Such as in idle fantasies do flit,
Infernal hags, centaurs, feendes, hippodames,
Apes, lyons, eagles, owles, fooles, lovers, children, dames."

There is little character in his poems. The knightly Rugiero, the brave Orlando, and the gallant Astolfo, are no better distinguished from each other than Virgil's "fortemque Gyan, fortemque Cloanthum." The charm is in the nature and connection of the incidents, and still more in the unrivalled beauty of the style. He is indeed a most consummate master of the graces and elegancies of his delicious language. In beauty and melody of versification he is unrivalled; happy alike in the choice of epithets and circumstances, his descriptions are perfect pictures, and glow in the most vivid coloring of the imagination. His very negligence is pleasing, with here and there an unfinished line, a careless repetition; but the nicest critic would abandon in despair this task of correcting these more than venial errors. Often a playful turn is given, as in Beppo and Don Juan, to the ending of a serious stanza; and as he changes, camelion-like, his hue "from grave to gay," from sportive mirth to lofty eloquence or deep pathos, we follow him astonished, dazzled, and delighted. He possesses all that "curiosa felicitas" of Horace, denied to most modern authors, and that perfection of art which consists in its concealment.

"That which all fair works doth most aggrace,
The art which all that wrought appeared in no place."

Cervantes undoubtedly far excels him in strong sense of the humorous and delicate strokes of satire; Le Sage is immeasurably his superior in the delineation of character, and in the living, breathing, practical spirit of his scenes; but, besides these, there are few works of imagination of such unalloyed, delightful, intense interest.

It is exceedingly difficult to institute any comparison between minds so different in their objects and their powers as those of Ariosto and Tasso. All parallels in fact from Plutarch downwards, are real parallels, that is, they run side by side, but never meet in a point. This question, too, has been a thousand times discussed, and as often left unsettled. It is a disputed point, on which each takes the side that pleases him; a field open to all, in which every critical aspirant is at liberty to break a lance.

There are two great classes of the beautiful, and two great sects among its admirers; the one those who love to follow nature into whatever extravagances or excesses she wanders; the other those who lay claim to nicer refinement and more fastidious taste; who prefer polished weakness and finished art to coarse strength and lawless energy. Each class has its favorites; the one kindles with the fire of Homer, and are carried away by the power of Shakspeare; the other rather linger over the pensive elegance of Virgil, and sympathize with the graceful tenderness of Racine. The one is the English, the other the French school. The one generally prefer Ariosto, while the other award the palm to the more regular, finished beauties of Tasso. Tiraboschi, in his history of Italian literature, has decided the question with tolerable fairness. He gives Ariosto's beauties the preference as being more vivid, original, and varied. "Tasso," says he, "is like a miniature painter, unrivalled in the beauty of design, the delicacy of his touch, and the fineness of his coloring. Ariosto is a Giulio Romano, or a Buonarroti, who puts before your eyes, and almost makes you touch with your hand the gayest and the grandest scenes. Metastasio," continues he, "used to say, that if Apollo were to give him the choice of being one of the two poets, he would certainly hesitate, yet as certainly decide for Tasso; 'for my part,' says Tiraboschi, 'in such a case I should first ask pardon of Tasso, and then choose to be Ariosto.'"

SKETCH FROM THE DIARY OF A POET.

COMPIED BY PERMISSION.

ALTHOUGH no believer in astrology, I am sometimes inclined to think that certain men are born under a lucky star, and others under a malignant one. If so, I belong to the latter class. A hateful planet has shed down its dark influence upon me, or some fiend delights to thwart my wishes. So convinced am I of this, that I have ceased to expect the favor of fortune, who discovers her hatred towards me in so many instances; and when any incident occurs calculated at first sight to give me pleasure, I am so used to the old tricks of the goddess, misnamed blind, that I look upon it only as a misfortune mocking me under the mask of a blessing. Ever since I first began to note the circumstances of this poor fantastic world, I could perceive that while the barks of others were floating gaily, banners flying and music playing, with prosperous breezes and a favorable tide, I, a sad, neglected, solitary creature, have rowed my little boat against the current. My affections are deep, but no one loves me. My pride is high and haughty, but is continually mortified. Nature has created me with an ardent thirst for admiration and fame, but has made me totally destitute of the means of acquiring either. My heart sometimes swells in my bosom with the bitterness of despair, and I exclaim with the unhappy Dane, "What should such fellows as I do crawling between heaven and earth?" There have been beings who understood me, in whose love I was blessed, in whose society I was happy; but my dreadful destiny gave them only that I might conceive the bliss of which I am capable, and feel more acutely the anguish I am doomed to suffer; for even those few the light, the talented, the gay, greet me no longer among the careless multitude who throng the surface of the globe regardless of my fate.

Monday. Last night I wandered forth alone, as usual. My feelings were melancholy and led me towards the place of sepulture. How the tumult of worldly passion is hushed among these quiet and pleasant graves. With what a sad beauty the rosy sunset-beams lighted up the mournful spot. The stir and din of the distant city were stilled. I remembered the times that were gone. Where were they whom I loved, with their bright faces and endearing words? Alas! alas! they were here—at my feet—yet they knew me not. The tenderness of a child was in my soul, and I hid my face. Then the sun went down and shadows were around me, the stars beamed brilliantly out, one after another along the deep summer heavens, and the moon trembled in the river. A pensive smile softened all the features of surrounding nature. The dewy flowers curled up their perfume-breathing leaves. I lingered in the deserted grove whose silence was unbroken even by the voice of birds. The pale queen of heaven gleamed down through the outspreading branches, and sprinkled the turf with touches of silver light. Child of mirth and fashion, who fliest the solitude of her home, and findest companionship only in the dazzling crowd, at such an enchanted hour as this, hither bend your steps—here pause above the graves of the newly dead whom you have loved, and learn what it is to be alone—utterly alone.

Thursday. What am I made for? I have not the strength of the clown, nor the skill of the artist. I cannot guide the affairs of others nor my own. I cannot even control the rapid current of my own thoughts and feelings. Wretchedness has been in my heart. Fate seems forever presenting the cup of happiness to my lips that I may see it dashed to the earth. Around me are spreading paths of summer beauty which I cannot pursue. A cold feeling, like a dagger, is in my soul. Surely this poor overloaded existence is a burthen I would gladly lay down.

Saturday. Why has nature placed that mysterious power of consciousness—my soul—in a mean, diminutive form? Why has she shaped my features in a repulsive mould, given me a harsh voice, and no power of expressing my sentiments. I can feel, but I cannot speak. What burning and thrilling impressions scenes and events make on me! They sweep across my soul as a hand flung over a fine instrument, or the wind playing among the chords of the Æolian harp. The expression of a radiant face—the shadowless irrepressible gaiety of childhood, unconscious of the future—the contemplation of a fine scene in nature—poetry, eloquence, music. Could I but give utterance to the feelings they awaken—but my lips are sealed—the voice of my spirit dies away unanswered in the dark and silent chamber of my own thoughts. My soul yearns for another existence. I have nothing to do—nothing to hope in this.

Monday. I saw to-day an eagle confined in a cage. Magnificent wanderer of the trackless heaven. How proudly he has snatched the gale and floated in the blue expanse among his snow-capped mountains. Now his ruffled plumage was soiled—his useless wings drooped. Yet how haughty his gaze—how still, and stern, and lonely his spirit seemed. I almost cowered beneath his kingly glance. How grand in himself—how much more so when regarded as an emblem of man.

Friday. Nature's most exquisite charm is her simplicity. From the unutterably vast machinery of the universe to the bursting forth of a morning flower, for the first time crimsoning in the light and bending beneath the heavy dew, she is all simplicity. She is never the same, and her changes are made with the facility of thought. This afternoon brought a storm of thunder and lightning. Surrounded by romantic and picturesque scenery, I watched it as it broke gradually in upon the deep rich repose of the air and the valley. The banks of snowy white clouds which had been piled up gorgeously in the distant horizon, blackened the whole heaven and deluged the earth. Then the sun streamed through the broken masses and half the sky displayed the softest azure. The deep vale—the groupings of the rich giant oaks—the sloping meadows of verdure were illumined with a rejoicing beauty. The watery branches glittered as the rays struck through their heavy foliage, lighting up the dimly seen recesses of the solitary forest; the warbling of birds burst forth around me, the low of the distant cattle blended with the dashing of a brook, which swollen by the rain, inundated its grassy banks and poured its foaming and rapid flood over a ledge of broken rocks; and, as the exhausted clouds were driven lightly by the gentle wind across the blue heaven, the broad rainbow suddenly reared its arch—the fairy wonder of the heavens. How inexpressibly beautiful are all these to me; and yet being purely physical and uninformed by the mysteries of thought and feeling, how immeasurably inferior they are, in the philosophic eye, to the forms of life, and especially the human form in its fairest semblance—beautiful children. My affection for women is checked by the conviction that I am hideous in their eyes. The gay, the graceful, the accomplished win their smiles. I droop beneath their observing glances. But children, untaught in the sophistries and passions of maturity, do not perceive these distinctions. They return your love instinctively, and they have not learned to check their instincts.

Monday. I have blamed myself for suffering so much regret that nature has branded me with a dull and hateful aspect—that she has denied me all the attractions and graces, both of person, manner, and mind, which please in other men. This feeling I have ascribed to vanity, but unjustly. My regret is natural, and is founded in my affections. It is not that I crave to be admired, but to be loved. I never felt the malignity of fate in this, more sensibly than yesterday. It sprang from the idlest dream—but I have forgotten to observe that for the last several months, driven into solitude and at a loss for every recreation, I had with fear and trembling flung together some loose verses, which before I was aware had accumulated to a great number. One morning I missed them, and thought of them no more. Caroline—why do I pause at that name! What feeling of disappointment comes over me with its chilling shadow. Surely our paths lie far asunder. Among the stanzas missing were a few addressed to her, although never intended for her eye. The consciousness of my personal defects have rendered my manner cold—especially towards females in whom I find myself at all interested, for I am sensitive to ridicule to a degree that has embittered my life. In the stanzas alluded to, I had endeavored to define the thoughts which her presence aroused in my mind. What could I have in common with her in this existence? We are different beings. Nature has exhausted her art in shaping the beauties of her person—in framing the structure of her clear mind—her fond and endearing disposition. Yet she is unconscious that her every motion presents a picture which a master painter would seize as a treasure; display it to posterity and be immortal. What a perfect symmetry dwells in her form. What a full, soft, and Hebe loveliness—a creature of light, joy, and fascination—courted by all—while I move only to shock the sight: speak but to affright the ear; a detestable, wretched, misformed, forgotten outcast—with nature's displeasure marked on my countenance. I shrink from observation, and hide my head from the light. Therefore have I grown up in solitude, and have chosen the bee, the bird, and the forest trees for my companions.

Tuesday. What fatal chance flings me into the society of this bewitching girl. Is it possible that—or is fate but framing for me a new disappointment, of more refined cruelty than all others? What means the kindness of her manner—dare I?—but alas! no. She pities me—she never dreams of love. It is the entire impossibility of such a thing that suffers her to speak to me in the unguarded manner of her own gentle nature, even as she would caress a dog. We walked yesterday in company with several merry friends, she the lightest of all. Yet once, unobserved by the rest, she plucked a wild rose, that peeped brightly out from the green tangled bushes, and placed it in my hand. Hope filled my soul for a moment, but for a moment only. Stung with the thought of my own weakness, with the consciousness of my own unworthiness, I tore the floweret, and scattered its leaves on the ground. She rested her eyes on me with an expression which I felt tremblingly to the very core of my heart. Then her manner grew as cold as my own, and I could not catch her eye again.

Wednesday. After a week of separation I met her yesterday. We were both cold and civil. What cuts the soul more keenly than a look of contempt from one we love? Unable longer to endure it, I seized a moment of solitude, and wrote a few hurried lines. Company were around us—the careless and the happy—to whom life was all sunshine. Accident brought us again together, and alone, and I placed in her hand what I had written. She took it—grew pale, then crimson—then returned the paper.

"You have no other answer?"

"None."

"Then I may burn this?"

"You may."

"You hate me?" She was silent.

"I will never see you again—farewell." She grew yet paler.

"Caroline, dear Caroline, will you drive me from you for ever?"

"I am not the mistress of my actions."

"But if you were, might I hope that—"

She looked up, when a party, full of noisy mirth, were heard in the hall, and I found myself alone.

Twenty years after the date of the foregoing I was a traveller in a foreign country, under the most favorable auspices. Among the celebrated persons whom I was curious to behold, and to whom I had procured letters, was a poet, with whose verses the world is familiar, for they have shed a lustre around his name. By a peculiar train of circumstances, I acquired his most familiar friendship. His dwelling was such as a poet would select, and the spirit of the gifted possessor was visible in all its decorations. Among the rarest of these was his wife; a lady whose charms time seemed to have softened, not destroyed. Their conversations were full of instructive matter, to which I listened with much pleasure, and in which I mingled only as an inquirer and a pupil.

Among other subjects, we once discussed the nature of a poet. Such an interesting theme animated me to speak more than was my custom, for I am just sufficiently a poet myself to admire the works of genius.

"Poetry," said I, "is the loftiest gift of heaven. It hallows its possessor and makes him happy."

"The fame of his productions pleases him," said my friend, "and endows him with worldly advantages, but the feeling itself is no compensation for misfortune."

"It would be a curious subject of inquiry," said I, "to suppose one gifted with all the elements of poetry, yet unconscious of his own power, divested of the favors of fortune, and entirely unknown to the world—with perceptions he could not explain—affections not appreciated by others. There must be such men, and probably many of them pass to their graves unnoticed."

"That is not the case with all, however," said the wife with an arch smile, "as I have read among some of the early manuscripts of my husband, a very sage disquisition upon the subject, which you would scarcely deem consistent with his present goodly condition, both in mind, person, and estate."

"Among all the blessings with which fate has endowed my dear Caroline," said the poet, "the most valuable of female accomplishments, that of talking, you see has not been omitted. But since she has been a tell-tale, I will revenge myself by giving you a perusal of the manuscript."

The lady blushed and looked a little alarmed—the good-natured and contented author, enjoyed her confusion, and placing in my hand a manuscript volume which bore many marks, both of carelessness and time, I perused the sketch given above. It appears that the stanzas he alluded to were taken from him and published by a familiar friend, and immediately laid the foundation for the brilliant fame he has since acquired. His person, although he was by no means a handsome man, when rendered interesting by a very striking genius, does not seem to have been so particularly disagreeable in the eyes of the lady, who has made him a very affectionate wife and delightful companion, although without that immeasurable superiority with which the fervor of a poetic fancy had invested her.

REMARKS ON THE CHARACTER, CONDUCT, SITUATION, AND PROSPECTS Of those who live by the labor of their hands.

BY MATTHEW CAREY.

What mean ye, that ye grind the faces of the poor? saith the Lord God of Hosts.—Isaiah.

THE subject of the following essays is deeply interesting to a large portion of the human race, much of whose happiness, morals, and manners depends on its being correctly understood and rightly acted on. It therefore demands the most serious reflection of the wise, the good, and the liberal.

Some of the most material of the opinions herein contained are in direct hostility with those generally prevalent on the same subject, and even by some highly enlightened citizens. But few can be ignorant that men may be enlightened on a variety of topics, and yet may be radically in error on others. Bacon believed in astrology, Johnson in the Cocklane ghost, and the great judge Hale in witchcraft. He sentenced a miserable wretch to death for that imaginary crime. Need I add a word to prove the folly of placing implicit credit, without due examination, on opinions sanctioned by great names, or regarded as venerable by their antiquity?

All I ask for such opinions as at the first view may appear heterodoxical, is a fair, candid, and repeated examination. Let them not be cast aside with scorn, as mankind are too apt to do, because they do not coincide with preconceived views. If they cannot pass the ordeal, let them perish. If otherwise, I hope they will meet with that attention, and produce those practical results which the importance of the subject demands.

Let me most earnestly, but most respectfully conjure the ladies into whose hands these lines may come, to ponder deeply, and frequently, and lastingly on the deplorable condition of at least twelve thousand of their sex, who in the four cities of Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, are ground to the earth by an inadequate remuneration for their painful labors. Let them raise their voices, and exert their influence in their defence, and urge their male friends to enter the lists in the holy cause of suffering humanity. I am not so enthusiastic or deluded as to suppose that a complete remedy can be applied to so enormous and so inveterate an evil—an evil, the remedy of which requires more generosity and disinterestedness than usually falls to the lot of mankind. But by proper efforts the oppression of the mass of the sufferers may be at least mitigated, and no inconsiderable portion of them may be completely relieved.

The ladies will, I hope, pardon me for an observation which applies to some of them—but I trust to only a few. I have known a lady expend a hundred dollars on a party—pay thirty or forty dollars for a bonnet, and fifty for a shawl—and yet make a hard bargain with a seamstress or washerwoman, who had to work at her needle or at the washing-tub for thirteen or fourteen hours a day, to earn a bare livelihood for herself and a numerous family of small children! This is "a sore oppression under the sun," and ought to be eschewed by every honorable mind. "Let it be reformed altogether."

I propose in these essays to consider and attempt to refute certain pernicious errors that too generally prevail respecting the situation, the conduct, the characters, and the prospects of those whose sole dependence is on the labor of their hands—who comprise, throughout the world, two-thirds, perhaps three-fourths of the human race—and on whose services the other third or fourth depend for their necessities, their comforts, their enjoyments, and their luxuries. Whatever concerns the comfort or happiness, the morals or the manners of such a large portion of mankind—whatever tends to increase or decrease the former, or to elevate or depress the latter, is deeply interesting to all whose views extend beyond their own narrow selfish concerns, and who, without the services of this class, would be forlorn and helpless.

The class in question is susceptible of two great subdivisions—those who are so well remunerated for their labors as to be able, not merely to provide, when employed, for seasons of stagnation and sickness, but by industry, prudence, and economy, to save enough in the course of a few years to commence business on a small scale on their own account. With this fortunate description, which is numerous and respectable, I have no concern at present. My object is to consider the case of those whose services are so inadequately remunerated, owing to the excess of labor beyond the demand for it, that they can barely support themselves while in good health and fully employed, and of course, when sick or unemployed, must perish, unless relieved by charitable individuals, benevolent societies, or the guardians of the poor. I use the word "perish" with due deliberation, and a full conviction of its appropriate application to the case, however revolting it may seem to the reader—for as these people depend for daily support on their daily or weekly wages, they are, when those wages are stopped by whatever means, utterly destitute of wherewith to support their existence, and actually become paupers, and therefore, without the aid above stated, would, I repeat, "perish" of want.

The crisis of suffering through which this class has recently passed here and elsewhere, and the occurrence of similar suffering in all hard winters, (and, in other seasons, from sickness and destitution of employment) often without receiving that extra aid which such a state of things loudly demands, appears to require a sober and serious investigation in order to probe to the bottom so deplorable a state of things, whereby the comfort and happiness of such a large portion of human beings are so cruelly shipwrecked, and to ascertain what are the causes of the evil, and whether it is susceptible of any remedy.

The erroneous opinions, to which I alluded in the commencement of this essay, are—

1. That every man, woman, and grown child, able and willing to work, may find employment.
2. That the poor, by industry, prudence, and economy, may at all times support themselves comfortably, without depending on eleemosynary aid—and, as a corollary from these positions,
3. That their sufferings and distresses chiefly, if not wholly, arise from their idleness, their dissipation, and their extravagance.
4. That taxes for the support of the poor, and aid afforded them by charitable individuals or benevolent societies, are pernicious, as, by encouraging the poor to depend on them, they foster their idleness and improvidence, and thus produce, or at least increase the poverty and distress they are intended to relieve.

These opinions, so far as they have operated—and, through the mischievous zeal and industry of the school of political economists, by which they have been promulgated, they have spread widely—have been pernicious to the rich and the poor. They tend to harden the hearts of the former against the sufferings and distresses of the latter—and of course prolong those sufferings and distresses. Many wealthy individuals, benevolent and liberal, apprehensive lest they might produce evil to society, are, by these doctrines, prevented from indulging the feelings of their hearts, and employing a portion of their superfluous wealth for the best purpose to which it can be appropriated—that purpose, which, at the hour of death, will afford the most solid comfort on retrospection—that is, "to feed the hungry, to give drink to the thirsty, to clothe the naked, to comfort the comfortless." The economists in question; when they are implored by the starving poor for "bread," tender them "a stone." To the unfeeling and uncharitable of the rich (and such unhappily there are) these doctrines afford a plausible pretext, of which they are not slow to avail themselves, to withhold their aid from the poor. They have moreover tended to attach a sort of disrepute to those admirable associations of ladies and gentlemen, for the relief of the poor, on which heaven looks down with complacency, and which form a delightful oasis in the midst of the arid deserts of sordid selfishness which on all sides present themselves to the afflicted view of the contemplative observer.

I. So far as regards the first position which I have undertaken to combat, it will scarcely be denied by any candid person that in the most prosperous times and countries there are certain occupations which, by the influence of fashion or other causes, suffer occasional stagnations. There are other occupations at which employment is at all times precarious, and others again which furnish little or no employment at certain seasons of the year.

To the first class belong all those who minister to the fanciful wants of society—wants contracted or expanded by the whim or caprice of fashion. For instance, the king of England or the Prince of Wales having, some years since, laid aside his shoe-buckles, and supplied their place with ribbands, shoe-buckles became unfashionable, and the journey-men buckle-makers were reduced to a state approaching to starvation. Cases of this kind occur occasionally in this country, though not to the same extent nor arising from exactly the same cause. But, whatever may be the cause, the effect is equally oppressive to the sufferer, deprived of his usual sources of support. Three instances occur to my mind at this moment. The custom of cropping the hair threw half the hair-dressers out of employment. The use of lamps produced a similar effect on the chandlers. And the introduction of marble cutting in the New-York prisons has operated perniciously on the stone-cutters of that state, particularly in the metropolis.

In the second class the most conspicuous are the spoolers and seamstresses employed on coarse work, who, being far more numerous than the demand for their service requires, a portion of them are at all times but partially employed.

In the third class may be enumerated laborers on canals and turnpike roads, hod carriers, wood sawyers, wood pilers, &c. &c.

Instances repeatedly occur in our cities of decent men, with the most satisfactory recommendations, seeking employment in vain for months as porters. There is at all times a superabundance of clerks. An advertisement for a person of this class will, in an hour or two, produce a dozen or two of applications. I have known persons of this description, burthened with families, obliged to descend to menial and degrading employments for support.

It is frequently said, as a panacea for the distresses of those people, "Let them go into the country—there they will find employment enough." To say nothing of the utter unfitness of most of those persons for country labor, this is taking for granted what remains to be proved. The country rarely affords employment for extra hands, except for a few weeks in the harvest. Farmers are generally supplied with steady hands at all other seasons. But were it otherwise, take the case of a man of a weakly constitution, with a wife and three or four small children; what a miserable chance would he stand of support by country labor!

So far as regards seamstresses and spoolers, the employment of the two classes, through the year, does not average above forty or forty-five weeks. One thousand of the former have been employed by the Providence Society in this city, during a winter, who could procure only four shirts per week, for which they received but fifty cents! Some of them, living two miles from the office, had to travel four miles for this paltry pittance—and above half of them had no other dependence. In the absence of all other evidence, this would be abundantly sufficient to establish the cruelty and injustice of the accusations brought against this ill-fated and oppressed class, when they are involved in the general censure passed on the poor for idleness and improvidence.

LETTERS FROM BOSTON.

THEATRICALS.

BOSTON, April 18, 1831.

My last letter, I believe, was in relation to that body of men whose ill report is worse than a bad epitaph. What has contributed to render the drama so little fashionable, that nothing but some unusual excitement can attract any thing like a numerous audience? A friend at my elbow suggests that it is a barbarous amusement, and must of course decline with the advance of civilization. Were the Athenians barbarous, or the Parisians, when the theatre flourished most splendidly in Paris and Athens? This decline may be attributed partly to the increased circulation and diminished price of amusing books, partly to caprice, and partly to the fact that talent can be better and more surely paid than by writing for the stage. Without good new plays it is the natural course of things that interest in theatricals should gradually subside; without first-rate actors, the boxes which have been crowded with listeners to a Cooke or a Kean, will inevitably be empty.

But to continue with sketching the players—those who are worthy of it. Who can be better in their respective lines than the two Barretts—husband and wife? Through the range of genteel comedy, in the characters that have a dash of the gentleman and the blood—the Tom Shuffletons, for instance, or the Charles Surfaces—there can be nobody livelier or more natural than Mr. Barrett. He sometimes plays in tragedy too, as you all know, and all know, consequently, that it is not his forte. Mrs. Barrett, during the past winter, has been looking as beautifully, and playing as prettily as she did ten years ago, which is saying not a little for her fine appearance. She has one or two dresses which display her face and figure to such advantage that it is really worth the price of a theatre ticket only to look upon her.

Among the younger members of the corps is a gentleman whom I believe you have never had in either of the New-York theatres, but who promises very well in a line where we have very few who promise anything. I refer to Mr. Pearson. He made his debut, I have understood, about three or four years ago at Philadelphia. He has since been playing at Baltimore and New-Orleans, and during the present season here. He is a fine looking fellow, within a thought of six feet in height, with a good face, and a rich, powerful voice. In melo-drama—in the characters, for instance, of Rob Roy, Masaniello, Carwin—he is unsurpassed. The part of the distracted father, in a drama called the “Lear of private life,” he performed with great effect. This piece, by the way, was originally got up for Booth, at the Haymarket theatre, at the time Kean was playing Shakspeare’s Lear so successfully at one of the theatres royal. It had a great run originally, and was played here two or three nights in the early part of the season to very thin houses and then laid aside. Though the piece, as a whole, is more than sufficiently paltry, it affords in a single character good opportunities for fine acting, and Mr. Pearson improved them to the best advantage. During the season he has played Rolla, Pierre, Charles De Moore, Iago, (excellently) and, for his benefit recently, William Tell. When Mr. Pearson shall have learned to use more discretion in his violence, and acquired a better modulation of his fine voice, and a better command of his hands, which he now uses a little awkwardly, he will take a high stand on our stage.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Andrews are both in about the same line of business, and both excellent in it. But of all men to put on the air of a bumpkin, without sufficient sense to keep clear of burning or drowning, or, as the phrase has it, not knowing enough to go in when it rains, there is no one who can surpass Andrews. Off the stage he is very much of a gentleman in his character, manner, and appearance. But the shallowness of a self-conceited boor, and the stupidity of an empty-headed fool, you can find no where better represented than by Andrews when he makes up his face for it. He is well versed in stage trick, and makes it tell. But I should give a wrong idea of Andrews if I neglected to mention a character in which he has exhibited talent of the highest order. In the melo-drama of “Luke the Laborer” he plays with wonderful nature and effect. I have heard critics who have haunted the theatre for five and twenty years, mention it repeatedly as one of the finest performances ever given upon the stage. I have never seen him in it but once, and that two or three years ago, but my recollection of it is as fresh and vivid as if I had seen him but yesterday. It is impossible that there should be better or more impressive acting. Of course I do not tell you all this as news, for I am thinking you have had Andrews a couple of seasons in New-York, and if so, you unquestionably remember his Luke. In giving a complete list of the players, however, it is necessary to touch upon what you may already know much better than I do myself. Mr. Andrews is very popular here, and always draws a full and fashionable house at his benefit.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith are a handsome couple and clever in their business. The husband represents fops and hair-brained youths very well, but does wretchedly in tragedy, because his voice is about as little under his command as it well can be. Mrs. Smith is a pretty little woman, and behaves respectably in every thing she undertakes. Mrs. Russell, the wife of the manager, is pleasant, quite pretty, and plays well in lively comedy.

I have not as yet said any thing of Mr. Scott. He is in the tragedy line, and always plays the tyrants and villains. He has a marked face, and frequently an excellent conception of his character; but is too measured and forced in his utterance—a fault which he had better mend as speedily as possible. Mr. Scott performs in quite a variety of parts, and is a very useful and improving actor.

From this account, brief and imperfect as it necessarily is, you may infer the general character of our stock company. It is an excellent one, and if a single deficiency in it were supplied, there would be nothing to desire. We want very much an actress for our Juliets and Lady Macbeths. Mrs. Sharpe, a perfect lady in every thing, and a fine performer, was here a month or two early in the season, but when she left, it was all over with us. Now there is not a tragedy in the English language that can be got up decently without the assistance of a lady of this description—the Q. E. D. from all which is that we have not had a tragedy performed throughout as it should be, since we parted with Mrs. Sharpe. Now a deficiency like this is very lamentable, and we hope that next winter it may be supplied.

I cannot conclude a letter upon the theatre without alluding to the excellent style in which its affairs have been conducted by the present manager. Entering upon his duties at a time when strong efforts were making in private against all theatricals, and publicly attacked from the pulpit and by the press, he has so carried himself as to conciliate the respect and regard of all parties. If he pursues the same course in which he has hitherto proceeded, we have confident hopes that the playhouse may be again a popular and fashionable resort.

P. G.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

PARK.—The new petit comedy of the “Lion of the West” was produced, for the first time, on Monday evening, for the benefit of Mr. Hackett. It was received by a numerous audience with decided marks of approbation. The honorable Colonel Nimrod Wildfire, a raw Kentuckian, just come to congress, found an able and very successful representative in Hackett, who kept the house in a roar by his comical and characteristic narrations. Richings dressed and looked the Count de Crillon (a pompous caricature of lofty deportment and high rank) extremely well, but the part is entirely out of his line; besides which, his ignorance of the French language should prevent him from assuming characters of that description. The count should have been sustained by Placide. Indeed, the injudicious cast of the piece in several instances detracted much from the effect which it would otherwise have produced. With a little more attention the managers might have rendered the ball-room scene quite effective. Mrs. Sharpe met a very favorable reception as Cecilia Bramble, which she performed with her usual spirit. This lady afterwards appeared in the farce of “Perfection,” as Kate O’Brien, a part not within her range, but in which she was quite successful, considering the strong impression made by Clara Fisher in the same piece.

Mr. Forrest, as Metamora, commenced an engagement on Wednesday evening. During his present stay in this city a new tragedy will be brought out under his direction. There are few candidates more distinguished by public favor than our American tragedian. New-York was the scene of his earliest successful efforts, and his occasional visits have been always greeted with enthusiastic welcome.

BOWERY.—We are pleased to observe that Mr. and Mrs. Barrett are once more connected with this theatre. Booth has also been advertised as a counter attraction to Mr. Forrest. A drama, founded on the popular story of the “Demon Ship,” as lately published in the Albion, has been represented. If the peculiarity of the title of the “Pirate Gibbs,” which has been added to the original one, serves to excite the temporary curiosity of the coarsest classes, its vulgarity will ensure the absence of respectable persons. We regret to perceive a repetition of these common-place appeals to the lowest tastes of the populace. Another little star has arisen in the person of Miss Alexina Fisher. She is several years younger than Master Burke, and yet bids fair to be his rival. Her enactment of Norval is said to have been surprisingly beautiful. The united powers of these two specimens of precocious genius (in Romeo and Juliet, for instance) would form a curious exhibition.

CHATHAM.—This establishment will re-open on Monday. The managers deserve credit for the engagement of Mr. Thayer, a performer always agreeable and amusing, and, in a certain line—light dandies and pert footmen—altogether unrivalled among us. His personation of the dandy, in the Caliph of Bagdad, is highly lauded by the critics. From our knowledge of his peculiar style, we are certain it must be a most unique and ludicrous affair.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The present number.—This impression of the New-York Mirror contains an engraving by J. Smilie, from a drawing by J. Burford. It is intended rather as a specimen of the art, than a satisfactory view of New-York, which, from Jersey city, is rendered indistinct by the distance. It has been our constant endeavor to effect a progressive improvement in the appearance and literary character of this paper, and the quality of the engravings. The number is composed entirely of original matter, mostly from well-known correspondents. We solicit the attention of our subscribers to the “view,” as altogether more skilfully executed and highly finished than any of its predecessors. The communication in a previous page, on the subject of the distress among the poorer classes of laborers, in consequence of the extreme low rate of wages, although rather inconsistent with the general plan of the Mirror, we hope will be found worthy of a perusal. The author has furnished us with two other short essays, in continuation, which we shall publish successively. A subject involving the happiness of many thousands of unfortunate beings, cannot be unworthy, at least, of a brief investigation. The verses headed “Ode to France,” are from the pen of a deaf mute, who has earned an extended reputation by his effusions. They discover taste and talent, although, in this instance, the furor of a poetic imagination may have betrayed the unfortunate young author into several political extravagancies, for which the beauty of the stanzas will, we trust, in the eyes of the indulgent reader, afford a sufficient apology. Arrangements have been made for the future, by which we are enabled to promise with confidence that a continual improvement may be depended on in every department of our journal; and that, in particular, the engravings will equal the best which can be procured in the country.

Distortion of the Spine.—This is a disease peculiar to females, and frequently originating in want of exercise or a too confined method of dressing. The principal symptom is an elevation of one shoulder from the weakness of the vertebrae of the spine. We have lately conversed with Dr. Grigg of Boston, whose views upon this subject are sound and interesting. His laborious examination of it, has resulted in the invention of a machine, which is said to afford the most desirable effect in restoring the true condition of the body. The elegant apparatus which has recently occupied so much of his attention, has been pronounced by the most distinguished surgeons, admirably well calculated to effect the purpose for which it is intended, and many of the Boston journals speak of it in the highest terms. It is of the utmost importance that females inclined to weakness and consumption, should be acquainted with this useful and ingenious machine. A timely application will not only have a tendency to correct awkward and injurious habits, but will, in many instances, rescue the patient from a premature grave. It may be proper to add, that the operations required by it are not attended by pain, or any other disagreeable consequences.

Style.—A contemporary, in speaking upon a political subject, uses the following elegant image:—“In this time of great excitement and party contest, and where political serpents are picking on the rudder of our free institutions, let us look out for talented men to fill our high stations!” This eloquent burst of imagination, reminds us of an oration delivered some time ago, by an orator whose elegance of diction gives him a distinguished rank among public speakers!

“The latent recesses of ignorance and pollution were eviscerated for the promotion of this scheme of inordinate ambition; subsidies were lavished, business neglected, and strolling magicians, onerated with electioneering incantations, were ablegated to expedite with their vociferations the political millennium which this combination of redoubtable patriotism was effectuating. This war has had no immunity from factious malediction since the period of its promulgation; its prematurity and impolicy are the flagitious absurdities with which factional garrulity is employed, and even futurity is permeated in search of predictions of its unfavorable termination.”

Omnibus.—An accommodation coach, of uncommon dimensions, bearing the above classical title, and drawn by four white horses, has made its appearance among the Broadway stages. Its exterior is as showy as the interior is capacious and convenient. A ride in it for several days after it started, subjected the passenger to as much attention as the adventurers in the first ship that approached the shores of the Indians. We notice it, however, at present to recommend the owners of the other, cumbersome vehicles of a similar kind to adopt the example of the “Omnibus,” in attaching an additional pair of horses.

YES, E'EN IN PARTING THERE'S A PLEASURE.

MUSIC BY GEMINIANI—WORDS BY S. WOODWORTH.—NEVER BEFORE PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE following ballad is a beautiful specimen of the old school. If there is a tinge of formality in the style, which fashion and change of ideas have banished at the present day, it yet retains that firm and regular progression of the bass, which is characteristic of the old masters, and is justly considered an eminent beauty in their compositions. To the readers of the Mirror who are familiar with Dr. Arne's writings, a striking analogy will be presented in this air by Geminiani. Giordani is another author of the same school. Great sweetness of melody is the attribute of the three, and the amateur who has been basking in the sunshine of Rossini will be often happy to repose himself in the tranquil and unassuming melodies of such masters. The general and unworthy effect of change produced in music by fashion is oblivion of the past. In this country the evil tendency of this state of things is remarkable. We have not ascended regularly to the top of the mountain, but have been conveyed there (if we may be allowed so to speak) by a pair of wings, invented by Garcia; and, consequently, we not only cease to remember the various resting-places on the road, but our passage has been so rapid, it is not quite clear that we know of their existence. We can, however, take upon ourselves to assure our readers that a retrospection of our musical path at leisure will afford the observer an opportunity of finding many beautiful gems, although of an unpretending description; and we venture to point out the present melody as one.

Yes, e'en in part - ing there's a plea-sure, One bal-my sweet re - deem - ing trea-sure, Long che-rish'd in the ho - ver's heart, Else, who, a - las! could live to part? It is the sweet con - fess - ing tear, It is the tell-tale sigh we hear, It is the kiss of love sin - cere, It is the kiss of love sin - cere. love sin -

21—Thus, lovers, too, in absence borrow,
From mem'ry's store, a balm for sorrow;

While Hope, with smile divinely sweet,
Still whispers of an hour to meet;

When eyes shall beam with pleasure's tear,
While rapture's sigh salutes the ear,

Breath'd in the kiss of love sincere,
Breath'd in the kiss of love sincere.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

SCRAPS FROM MY COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

NUMBER I.

Dr. B——, of New-Jersey, is not only one of the most learned, experienced, and sagacious physicians in this country, but the most free from pedantry and pretence. A gentleman once asked him the reason why certain diseases, such as measles, whooping-cough, and small-pox could only be had but once. After considering a moment, the doctor replied, "Eh!—if you will tell me why people have them once, then I will tell you why they never have them twice."

A GIGANTIC CRANE.—I have somewhere read of a bird that stood in the sea and touched the bottom with his feet where it was so deep that the head of an axe had been seven years falling without reaching the bottom!

SMELLING A DINNER.—Plutarch and Pliny both tell us of a nation in India that lived upon odors; and it is related of Democritus, that he lived seven days on the smell of hot bread.

GOOD FORTUNE.—Though some people get rich by sheer good luck, yet to sit down, fold our arms, and wait her coming, would be to act like the fool who waited on the bank of the river till he was nigh perishing with hunger, expecting that the water would run out at last, and he be able to pass over dry shod.

WASHINGTON CITY.—The Abbe Correa de Serra, formerly minister from Portugal, was not only a great scholar but a great wag. He defined the city of Washington—"A city of most respectable distances."

CIVILIZATION.—A savage once said to a white man, who reproached him with wanting the conveniences of life, "Your whole life is spent in laboring for things we have learned to do very well without."

A POET.—A poet is one that always looks through the spectacles of fancy.

EARTHQUAKES.—Earthquakes are the agues of the earth; volcanoes the fevers.

POWER OF MUSIC.—Philo, the Jewish rabbi, says that Moses was enabled to subsist forty days and nights in the wilderness without food by listening to the music of the spheres.

GENIUS.—It appears to me that strong sense and acute sensibility together constitute genius.

A HYPOCHONDRIAC.—His life was one infinite series of apprehensions, and he died at last of the fear of dying.

MEMORY AND HOPE.—Hope is the leading-string of youth, memory the staff of age.

FAWNING.—A cur will fawn even on a beggar, if he has a bone to throw away.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR:

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1831.

NUMBER 44.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—In looking over the previous numbers of your journal, I observed a very interesting memoir of Rossini, whose brilliant compositions are now the admiration of the city. From the sudden impulse with which the art of music has progressed in this community, I read it with more than ordinary interest, and it occurred to me that many, besides myself, would be pleased with brief sketches of the most eminent musical composers. Permit me, therefore, to enclose to you, for publication, the following outline biography of Mozart, the offsprings of whose wonderful genius are frequently represented in our theatres. It has just appeared in the London Musical Bijou, is fresh from the pen of a distinguished writer, and has never been published in this country. An insertion of it, therefore, would be gratifying to several who are accustomed to peruse your work with pleasure.

PORTIA.

REMINISCENCES OF WOLFGANG MOZART.

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE ROUE.

There was scarcely ever an infancy more remarkable than that of Mozart. Before he had attained his eighth year he had exhibited his musical talents in the principal courts of Europe, to the great admiration of his royal and courtly auditors, exciting no small degree of envy among the most experienced professors.

Handel displayed an astonishing love of his science as early as his eighth year, but Mozart had scarcely attained his fourth birthday before he astonished his father, no mean musician himself, by his proficiency at the piano.

It is true that every opposition was made by the parents of Handel to his inclination for music, while that of Mozart was encouraged and applauded by his father, who held the situation of vice kapell-meister and violinist in the chapel of the archbishop of Salzburg, and who was too happy to perceive in his son such early indication of excellence in his own science. Mozart was scarcely three years old when his father began to give lessons on the harpsichord to his sister, who was then seven. His astonishing disposition for music immediately manifested itself. His delight was to seek for thirds on the piano, and nothing could equal his joy when he found this harmonious chord.

At four years old, Mozart would learn a minuet in less than half an hour, and pieces of greater extent in less than twice that time; playing them immediately with the greatest clearness and perfectly in time. He was not, however, even at this early period content with playing, but already exhibited the extraordinary precocity of his musical mind by the composition of minuets and other little movements, which displayed a consistency of thought and a symmetry of design that promised a maturity of the highest genius; a promise which all the world acknowledges to have been fully realized. Arithmetic was the only pursuit that had the power to draw him even for a moment from music, and he made great progress in the science of figures; a science in which it is curious that there are many instances of infant precocity. During this period, so ardent was he in the pursuit, that the walls, chairs, and tables were covered with his figures. But he displayed the same ardor in every thing he undertook, and before he confined himself exclusively to music, he was so fond of the usual amusements of his age, that he frequently sacrificed even his meals to them. From the moment, however, he became acquainted with music, his relish for these amusements vanished, or to render them pleasing to him, it was necessary to introduce music into them. Sometimes they carried their playthings in procession, and the infant Mozart would sing a march, or some one would play it for him on the violin.

Music soon began, however, to engross him entirely, and he made such rapid advances that his parents could not help regarding him as a prodigy.

He was scarcely five years old when, on his return from church, his father discovered him writing, and inquired what he was about.

"I am composing a concerto for the harpsichord, and have almost finished the first part of it," replied the infant Mozart.

"Let us see this fine scrawl," said his father, taking up the sheet full of notes, which could scarcely be deciphered for the blots of ink, and was at first inclined to laugh heartily at the labors of his son. But as he read he became silent; the apparent confusion disappeared, and what had seemed a chaotic assemblage of blots, grew, upon perusal, into a systematic composition.

Tears swelled in the father's eyes, as turning to a professional friend he exclaimed, in a tone of joy and wonder, "Look, every thing is composed according to the strictest rules—it is a pity that the piece cannot be made use of, but it is too difficult; nobody would be able to play it."

"It is a concerto," replied the infant, "and must be well studied before it can be properly played." Then, sitting down to the piano, he continued, "This is the style in which it ought to be executed." He accordingly began to play, but succeeded only so far as to give them an idea of what he intended.

This anecdote is related by an eye witness, who says, that at that time the young Mozart firmly believed that to play a concerto was about as easy as to work a miracle, and, accordingly, the composition in question was a heap of notes, correctly placed, but presenting so many difficulties that the most skillful performer would have found it impossible to play it.

Every day now afforded fresh proofs of Mozart's exquisite organization for music. He could distinguish and point out the slightest difference of sound; and every false and rough note, not softened by a chord, was a torture to him. That such a gifted child should be considered a prodigy, and that the praises of all his friends should be lavished upon him was natural—but this had no effect upon his vanity, or upon the sweetness of his disposition, which was remarkably affectionate. The affection and sweetness which characterize so many of his airs were inherent in his disposition, and seem to have been drawn from the deep fountains of his own warm feelings. He loved his parents, particularly his father, so tenderly, that every night before going to bed he used to sing a little air that he had composed on purpose, his father having placed him standing in a chair, and singing second to him. During this affectionate ceremony he often kissed his father, and as soon as the singing was over, he was laid in bed, perfectly contented and happy.

On every occasion he manifested a kind and feeling disposition. There seemed a vast fount of love in his heart ready to be bestowed upon his fellow-creatures, and this was naturally accompanied by a strong desire of being loved in return. He would therefore frequently say to those about him, "Do you love me?" And whenever in jest they said no, the tears would roll down his cheeks. That this tenderness of his nature was a part of that organization which led to his excellence in his art, there can be little doubt; and there is scarcely a melody which he has left us, from his earliest composition to the requiem which he died in composing, that does not, in a greater or less degree, partake of this characteristic of his nature.

The infant composer so astonished his father by his progress, that before his son had attained his sixth year the Mozart family, consisting of the father, the mother, the sister, and our young hero, made a journey to Munich. Of this first expedition, which took place in January, 1762, little account is preserved. The two children performed before the elector, and astonished the royal family by their precision and execution.

At the court of Vienna the family was received with marked favor by the Emperor Francis the First, who playfully designated the young Mozart his "Little Magician." Compliments and praises now flowed from all quarters; the whole court were astonished, and the young Mozart became the wonder of all who heard him. The emperor, in particular, was very partial to him. His majesty one morning lingering near the piano said to him jokingly, "There is nothing wonderful in playing with all the fingers, but to play with one finger and the keys covered would indeed be surprising." Without manifesting any degree of surprise at this proposition, he immediately began to play with a single finger, with as much neatness and certainty as if he had long practised it. He afterwards desired them to cover the keys of the piano, and continued to play in the same manner with the greatest clearness and precision.

The father in another letter to his friend at Salzburg writes: "You will scarcely believe me when I tell you how graciously we have been received. The empress took Wolfgang on her lap, and kissed him heartily." With all this he was a complete child. One day on a visit to the empress, little Mozart was led into her presence by the two princesses, one of whom was afterwards the unfortunate Marie Antoinette. Being unaccustomed to the smoothness of the floor, his foot slipped and he fell. One of the princesses took no notice of the accident, but the other, Marie Antoinette, lifted him up, and consoled him; upon which he said to her in his childish accent, "you are very good—I will marry you." On this being related to the empress, she asked him how he came to make this resolution. He answered, "from gratitude; she was so kind to me." Here was another instance of that tenderness of disposition, which was so prominent a part of his character.

From his earliest age Mozart seems to have been animated with the true feeling of his art, and was never vain of the compliments paid him by the great. He used, even at this early period of his infancy, a remarkable discrimination with regard to his auditors, and only performed insignificant trifles when he had to play before people unacquainted with music, of whatever rank they might be. On the contrary, he played with all the fire and attention of which he was capable when in the presence of connoisseurs; and his father was often obliged to have recourse to artifice, and to make the great men before whom he was to exhibit pass for such with him.

Once, just before he commenced a concerto, seeing himself surrounded only by persons of the court, he asked the emperor, "Is not M. Wagenseil here? He understands these things." The emperor sent for Wagenseil, and gave up his place to him by the side of the piano. "Sir," said the infant Mozart, "I am going to play one of your concertos—you must turn over the leaves for me." He was at this period only six years of age!

As yet, Mozart had only played on keyed instruments, but having been presented with a small violin during his residence in Vienna, he practised frequently upon it on his return to Salzburg. A short time afterwards Weulz, a skilful violin player, who had then just begun to compose, came to Mozart the father, to request his observations on some trios which he had written during the journey of the former to Vienna. Schachtner, the archbishop's trumpeter, to whom Mozart was particularly attached, happened to be at the house, and we give the following anecdote in his own words: "The father," said Schachtner, "played the bass, Weulz the first violin, and I was to play the second. Mozart requested to take this last part, but his father reproved him for this childish demand, observing that as he had never received any regular lessons on the violin, he could not possibly play it properly. The son replied that it did not appear to him necessary to receive lessons in order to play the second violin. His father, half angry at this reply, told him to go away and not interrupt us. Wolfgang was so hurt at this that he began to cry bitterly. As he was going away with his little violin, I begged that he might be permitted to play with me, and the father, with a good deal of difficulty, consented. 'Well,' said he, 'you may play with M. Schachtner, on condition that you play very softly, and do not let yourself be heard, otherwise I shall send you out directly.' We began the trio, little Mozart playing with me, but it was long before I perceived, with the greatest astonishment, that I was perfectly useless. Without saying anything I laid down my violin, and looked at the father, who shed tears of affection at the sight. The child played all the trios in the same manner. The commendation we bestowed upon him made him pretend that he could play the first violin. To humor him we let him try, and could not forbear laughing on hearing him execute this part, very imperfectly, it is true, but still so as never to be set fast."

The peculiar delicacy of Mozart's organization is displayed in the fine sense of hearing which he evinced at a tender age. This same Schachtner had a violin that Wolfgang was very fond of playing upon, and which he used to praise exceedingly for its soft tone. On one occasion, as the boy was amusing himself with his own little violin, he said to Schachtner, "If you have left your violin tuned as it was when I last played upon it, it must be full half a quarter of a note flatter than mine." Those present laughed at a nicety of distinction upon which the most critical ear could hardly pronounce; but the father, who had many proofs of the extraordinary memory and exquisite feeling of his son, sent for the instrument, and it was found to be precisely as the boy had said.

It was most probable from this cause that, until he had attained his tenth year, he had an insurmountable horror of the sound of the trumpet, when it was used otherwise than as an accompaniment. The sight of this instrument produced upon him much the same impression as that of a loaded pistol does upon other children, when pointed at them in sport. His father thought he could cure him of this fear by causing the trumpet to be blown in his presence, notwithstanding his son's entreaties to be spared that torment; but at the first blast he turned pale, fell upon the floor, and would probably have been in convulsions if they had not immediately ceased.

Though the child every day beheld new proofs of the astonishment and admiration inspired by his talents, it neither rendered him proud nor self-willed; a man in talent—in every thing else he was an obedient and docile child. He understood, and obeyed the slightest signs made by his parents, and carried his obedience so far as to refuse the sweetmeats which were offered him when he had not their permission to accept them.

In 1763, the seventh year of Mozart's age, his family set out on their first expedition beyond the boundaries of Germany; and it was in this third tour that the fame of Mozart extended throughout Europe, and that the commencement of his celebrity is to be dated.

The tour commenced with Munich; and at Augsburg, Manheim, Frankfurt, Coblenz, Brussels, and other places the two children gave public concerts, or played before the principal persons in the place, and received every where the greatest commendations. But as they were generally rewarded with costly presents, swords, snuff-boxes, trinkets, &c. instead of money, the father had much anxiety on that account.

He says, in a letter from Brussels, "at Aix we saw the Princess Amelia, sister to the king of Prussia, but she has no money. If the kisses which she gave my children, especially to Master Wolfgang, had been louis d'ors, we might have rejoiced."

In Paris little Mozart performed feats which would have done honor to the most experienced professors; transposing at sight into any key whatever any airs that were placed before him, writing the melody to a bar and the bar to a melody, with the utmost facility and without premeditation. His deep acquaintance with harmony and modulation surprised everybody, and his organ playing was particularly admired.

When the family were at Versailles, Madame de Pompadour had young Mozart placed upon a table, but as he approached to salute her she turned away from him; upon which he said very indignantly, "I wonder who she is that she will not kiss me—the empress has kissed me." At this place the whole court was present to hear a little boy of eight years old play upon the organ, and he was treated with a great deal of distinction by the whole of the royal family, particularly by the queen. When she dined in public, young Mozart had the honor to stand near her, to converse with her constantly, and now and then to receive some delicacy from her hand.

It was at Paris, during this visit, that Mozart composed and published his first works, consisting of two sonatas for the harpsichord, with accompaniments for the violin; one of them was dedicated to Madame Victoire de France, the second daughter of Louis the fifteenth, and the other to the Countess de Tess. In the midst of all these triumphs the tenderness of his disposition remained the same. One morning on awaking from a deep sleep, and perhaps from a dream of his home, he began to cry. On his father asking him the reason, he expressed his sorrow at not being able to see his friends Hagenaur, Wenzl, Spitzede, and Reibl, musicians in the chapel of Salzburg. One can easily imagine his true remembrance at this moment of their kindness to him, and this is but one among a crowd of instances of the sensibility he evinced during the whole period of his childhood. In April 1764, the family arrived in England, where the young artist excited quite as much attention, and admiration as he had done on the continent. On their first arrival the father fell ill of a dangerous sore throat, and as during its continuance no practising could go on, his son employed himself in writing his first sinfonia. It was scored with all the instruments, not omitting drums and trumpets. His sister sat near him while he wrote, and he said to her, "remind me that I give the horns something good to do."

When playing before the English royal family, the king placed before Wolfgang not only pieces of Wagenseil, but of Bach, Abel, and Handel, all of which he performed at sight. At last the king gave him the bass part of one of Handel's airs, to which he composed so beautiful a melody that all present were lost in astonishment. That the king was delighted with him one may judge by the elder Mozart's writing that "a week after, as we were walking in St. James's Park, the king and the queen came by in their carriage, and although we were differently dressed, they knew us, and not only that, but the king opened the window, and putting his head out and laughing, greeted us with head and hands, particularly Master Wolfgang." Nothing can be more characteristic of George the third. After dedicating a set of sonatas to the queen, and experiencing great patronage from the nobility, Mozart, with his father and sister, crossed over to the Netherlands in July 1765.

At the Hague a fever attacked both children which at first endangered their lives; determined, however, not to remain idle, the young Mozart composed six sonatas during his return to convalescence. At length, after an absence of three years, and having composed a quodlibet for all the instruments at the installation of the prince of Orange, the family returned to Salzburg.

It is a remarkable trait that during this absence none of the younger Mozart's letters contain a word about his own extraordinary triumphs, nor any account of the applause he received, or the admiration he excited, but are filled with tender inquiries after those friends whom he had left behind him.

The young Mozart now enjoyed a year of quiet, and he spent it in uninterrupted study in the higher walks of composition. Besides applying to the old masters, he was indefatigable in perusing the works of Emmanuel Bach, Hape, Handel, and Eberlin, and by the diligent performances of these authors he acquired extraordinary brilliancy and power with the left hand. Here was a precociousness in the power of steady application as well as of talent; but it was all the effect of that fire of genius which was the very principle of his existence.

In 1767 the family again visited Venice, where Mozart, by command of the emperor, wrote his first opera, "La Finta Semplice," which was never performed, owing to the envy and cabals of the musicians and singers. In the presence of the father the performers lauded their parts to the skies, but their secret cabal against the work ultimately prevented its performance. Nothing can be a greater proof of the talent of young Mozart than this general rising of the established musicians to drive him out of the field of competition.

The Italian singers and composers, who were the established musicians in Vienna, did not like to find themselves surpassed by a boy of twelve years of age; and they therefore not only charged the composition with a want of dramatic effect, but they even went so far as to say that he had not scored it himself. To counteract such calumnies, Leopold Mozart afterwards obliged his son to put the orchestral parts to his compositions in the presence of spectators, which he did with wonderful celerity before Metastasio, Hape, the duke of Braganza and others. He had before, both in Paris and London, been driven to the same necessity by the same calumnious assertions of envious composers.

Writing upon the subject of this opera, for which Mozart did not receive a kreutzer, his father says, "The whole hell of music here has risen to prevent the talent of a child from being seen. The singers have sworn that if they are obliged to perform it, they will give it as miserably as they can, and do their best to spoil it."

He now again devoted himself to arithmetic, and made frequent requests for books in that science; and in this love for numbers may perhaps be discovered the foundation of that regularity and symmetry which distinguish his compositions; and had he not joined exquisite imagination and acute sensibility to his faculty for numerical calculations, he might have fallen into the dryness of a pedantic contrapuntist.

Such is an outline sketch of the infancy of Mozart, which was passed in a series of precocious triumphs unparalleled, we believe, in the history of any other man; and though our sketch has brought us only to the twelfth year of his age, yet his future progress was so rapid and displayed so much manliness of intellect, as well as the fire of original genius, that we dare no longer designate him a boy.

Young Mozart, having now mastered the Italian language, he and his father made the tour of Italy, and before he had attained the age of fourteen, when we find him delighting the famous contrapuntist, Martini, by the correctness of his answers in the rigore modi to any subject of fugue that might be laid before him—astonishing the cardinal, amateurs, and professors of Rome by bringing away the famous Miserere of Allegri from the Sistine chapel, and writing and performing it from his memory—elected unanimously a member of the Philharmonic academy at Bologna—and producing his opera of "Mitridate, Re di Ponto" at Milan. During this period he was idolized in Italy, and received with honors in every city that he visited. Every poet was ready with his effusions in honor of the young composer. Anacreontics, extempore sonnets and verses of all sorts were literally showered upon him. "Al Signore Armadeo Mozart, Giovinetto ammirabile—dulcissimo l'uero et elegantissimo Lyrista," &c.

On his return to Rome he was surprised at being addressed by the Cardinal Pallavicini as "Signore Cavalier," and thought it was a jest, until the cardinal presented him from his holiness with the order of the cross, the same honor which had before been conferred on Gluck. He playfully communicated the honor to his sister by finishing his next letter to her by "Mlle. J'ai l'honneur d'être votre très humble serviteur et frère, Chevalier de Mozart."

His opera of Mitridate was performed at Milan the twenty-sixth of December, 1770. It met with great success, many parts of it being encored, and scarcely an air played without being followed by loud applauses and cries of "Evviva il Maestro—Evviva il Maestro."

His works now so rapidly succeeded each other, that they can only be enumerated in some more elaborate biographical notice than such a mere sketch as this. But, melancholy to relate, as childhood and boyhood passed away, his patrons ceased to wonder at, or feel the same interest in his genius; and Mozart, whose early years had been passed in familiar intercourse with the principal nobility of Europe, who had been caressed by royalty in almost every kingdom he had visited, and received distinctions and caresses unparalleled in the history of his art, had now to earn his bread, as well as his fame, in the midst of worldly cares and annoyances, deceived by pretended friendship, persecuted by open enmity, and with all his genius, all his industry, and all his exertions, never obtaining any situation worthy of his acceptance.

Can any one read this and not blush to think of the sums lavished on many ephemeral composers of the present day, whose works are forgotten almost before the publisher has time to give them to the world; and whose names would never have been heard of but for the caprice of fashion, or the assurance and quackery of the composer?

Disappointed in his attempt to obtain the humble situation of music master to the royal family at Manheim, by which his talents might have been retained in that city for about forty pounds a year, he accompanied Wendling to Paris.

His wish for such a humble situation arose from that affectionate disposition which led him to prefer the society and praises of his friends to his hopes of more extended fame.

In Paris his life was far from comfortable through the cabal and envy of his competitors. In one of his own letters he writes, "If I were in a place where the people had ears to hear, hearts to feel, who only understood and possessed a little taste for music, I should laugh heartily at these things; but as far as regards music, I am living among mere beasts and cattle. How can it be otherwise? they are just the same in all their joys and sorrows, and in every thing else." He concludes by saying that he daily prays God he may bring honor to Germany, and become rich enough to help his father out of his straitened circumstances, that they may all live happily together. Here was a sentiment and a wish worthy of the tenderness of Mozart. But his life is full of these traits. From Paris he went to Vienna, which was a city much more congenial to his habits.

It is not to be supposed, that although occupied as Mozart was with his science, he could possess so much sensibility without experiencing the passion of love. The first person who seems to have inspired him with this feeling was Made-moiselle Aloysa Weber, a singer at Manheim. The sentiment was mutual, and they parted, depending upon each other's fidelity. The lady, however, broke her plighted vows, and on his return to Manheim would hardly recognise him. Mozart did not give himself up to despair, but transferred his regard to the younger sister Constance, whom he afterwards married. It was during the commencement of this new passion that he wrote his opera of Idomeneo, which, it is said, owes a great number of its beauties to the influence which his love had upon his mind. During the composition of this opera, the kindness of his disposition was shown by the alterations he made to please the performers. "I have still another alteration to make," he writes, "which is Raft's fault; he is, however, in the right, and if he were not, still one must do something to give his gray hairs pleasure."

To give any history of his compositions, or of the instances of his readiness and invention would require a volume, but notwithstanding the variety and number of his compositions

he found time for the enjoyment of his friends. He became the admiration of Haydn, who declared him the greatest composer that ever lived; and even Haydn's friend and admirer, the Baron Swieten, prophesied that he would surpass Haydn himself. Like Raphael, Mozart embraced his art in its whole extent: opera, sinfonias, songs, airs for dancing, sacred music—he was great in every thing. Of his piano-forte playing Haydn said, "I never can forget Mozart's playing, it went to the heart."

Such was Mozart in music, proving an almost singular instance of a remarkable child becoming a great man.

Mozart possessed no advantages of person, though his parents were remarkable for their beauty. He never reached his natural growth, and used in his letters to designate himself playfully "My Littleness." During his whole life his health was delicate. His hands were small and beautiful, and he used them so softly and naturally upon the piano that the eye was no less delighted than the ear. It is said of him that he was vain of his hands and feet, but not of having written Don Giovanni and the Requiem.

This man who, from his earliest age, had shown the greatest of mind in what related to his art, in other respects remained always a child. The management of domestic affairs, the proper use of money, the judicious selection of his pleasures, and temperance in the enjoyment of them, were not virtues much to his taste.

His exertions, added to that inextinguishable fire of genius which burnt within him, were too much for his frame. Yet in the last four months of his life, when his life was fast declining, he wrote "Die Zauberflöte," "La Clemenza di Tito," two "Cantatas," a "Concerto for the Clarinet," and the "Requiem" which he died in composing. "La Clemenza di Tito" was begun in the coach, on the road to Prague, and was finished in a fortnight; Mozart had already fallen sick, and looked pale and melancholy, though sometimes among his friends his spirits would revive.

From the moment, however, that he commenced his Requiem he seemed to think that it would be his last work, and that his death was nigh at hand. One fine day in autumn, to distract him from his work, his wife drove out with him to the Prater; as they sat down in a solitary spot he began to speak of his death, and said that he was writing the Requiem for himself, and as he said this tears came into his eyes. This idea never left his mind, and perhaps it was impressed the more strongly from the mystery with which the commencement of this task was attended. A stranger handsomely dressed was one day introduced by his servant to Mozart; he was dignified and of impressive manners, and stated himself to have been commissioned by a man of considerable importance to call upon the composer.

"Who is he?" demanded Mozart.

"He does not wish to be known," replied the stranger; "he has just lost a person whom he tenderly loved, and whose memory will be eternally dear to him. He is desirous of annually commemorating this mournful event by a solemn service, for which he requests you to compose a Requiem."

Mozart was forcibly struck by this discourse, by the grave manner in which it was uttered, and by the air of mystery in which the whole seemed to be involved.

He agreed to the proposition, and demanded a month for the completion of the work; he began rapidly, but as he proceeded, his strength failed him, and his task proceeded but slowly. The month being expired, the stranger made his appearance, received the composer's apology and gave him another month to finish the Requiem, but refused to tell his name or by whom he was employed—he departed, saying, "in a month's time I shall return."

Mozart immediately called one of his servants and ordered him to follow this extraordinary personage, but the man returned without being able to trace him. Poor Mozart was then persuaded that he was no ordinary being; that he had a connection with the other world, and was sent to announce to him his approaching end.

This prophesy was unhappily accomplished; he died during the composition of the Requiem, laboring at it almost in the hour of death. Of this melancholy event his sister-in-law writes thus:—"As I approached his bed he called to me, 'I am glad to see you here—you must stay to-night and see me die.' I tried to persuade him out of this, but he answered, 'I have already the taste of death upon my tongue, I can feel it, and who will be with Constance if you are not?' I only went away for a short time to give my mother some intelligence I had promised her, and when I came back to my disconsolate sister, Siissmaier was by Mozart's bed-side. Upon the counterpane lay the Requiem, and Mozart was explaining his meaning to him, that Siissmaier might complete the work after his death."

Thus, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, expired one of the greatest composers that ever lived, leaving his wife and two sons utterly unprovided for.

Mozart was the Shakespeare of music; and as long as the immortal bard is read, Mozart will live in the admiration of mankind. He has reached the passions through the ear as Shakespeare did through the mind, and no works will live that do not touch the passions and the heart—they are the same in all ages, and will make Shakespeare and Mozart a poet and a composer.

"For all time."

Two great lessons may be learned from Mozart by his successors in his own art, as well as by every man of talent. The one, his modesty which never led him to depreciate the composition of others or be vain of his own; and the other, the perseverance and industry with which his genius was cultivated. Great as he must have felt this genius to be, he never depended upon its inspiration, but studied as hard as though his mind were as dense as those of so many of his contemporaries.

From his childhood to the last moment of his life Mozart was wholly a musician. The foregoing anecdotes speak his early precocity; and his voluminous productions are the best attestation of the unwearied diligence of his maturer years.

Ever striving after higher and higher degrees of excellence, he existed only for his art. During the last month of his life, though weak in body he was "full of the god;" and a few hours before his death took place, he is reported to have said, "now I begin to see what might be done in music."

MYTHOLOGY.

THE MONTH OF MAY IN NEW-YORK.

ALTHOUGH the month of May, on which we have just entered, has been celebrated, time out of mind, as the season of 'genial airs,' fragrant flowers, and nature's most ravishing charms, still we are reluctantly compelled to acknowledge that there is more poetry than truth in such descriptions. There are, no doubt, some favored sections of this terraqueous globe where poetry's most vivid pictures of the third and last vernal month are annually realized. Such paradisaical regions, however, must lie under oriental or Italian skies, or in more southern latitudes of the western hemisphere. At any rate, they are not found in the vicinity of New-York, or in any portion of New-England. Our autumns are delightful, but our springs—it is a chilling subject.

It is true that some of nature's sweetest smiles are shed abroad during the month of May, but they are generally like Campbell's 'angel-visits,' and the comforts of coal fires and camblet cloaks are not unfrequently discussed in the mornings and evenings of this boasted "season of blossoms," love, and poetry. At the risk of being charged with literary heresy, we do not hesitate to avow a decided preference for the sister of this cold-hearted damsel, viz. honest, cherry-cheeked, glowing, buxom, romping June.

The name of the present month is derived from the Latin maius, or majus, so called by Romulus, from maiores, [noble ancestors.] The Saxons designated it by a word which signifies three milkings, because at that season their kine were milked three times a day.

With respect to memorable events, this month can boast of several. The first day is distinguished by the birth of Addison and the duke of Wellington, and the death of the celebrated poet Dryden. On the second Mary queen of Scots escaped from the prison of Lochleven, as described in Sir Walter Scott's novel of the Abbot. On the fourth was fought the great battle of Tewksbury, in which Edward the fourth defeated Queen Margaret, who, with her son Edward, were made prisoners, and the latter murdered by Gloster and Clarence. Henry the sixth was at that time a prisoner in the tower, where, on the twenty-first of the same month he was assassinated by the "crooked-back'd Richard." On the fifth Mahomet was born, and on the twenty-ninth Charles the second of England was restored to the throne of his father.

May has her saints also; the first day being devoted to St. Philip, St. James, and St. Tammany; and the sixth to St. John the evangelist. The seventh (this year) is Rogation Sunday, the twelfth Ascension-day, and the twenty-second Whitsunday, (or white Sunday,) in allusion to the white robes of the catechumens. Trinity Sunday falls on the twenty-ninth.

On the twenty-first of this month the sun enters the sign of Gemini, or the twins, whose Grecian names are Castor and Pollux. Their story is extant, not "in choice Italian," but in classic Greek, and is briefly as follows:

The same pride of ancestry that renders many of our modern gentry ridiculous, induced some of the good society of antiquity to claim even a divine origin. This was peculiarly the case among the Greeks; and, consequently, there is little doubt that even the father of their gods was made to father many a transgression of which he was innocent. Be this as it may, the Spartan (not Siamese) twins, of whom we are speaking, were said to be the sons of Jupiter; though Sparta's king, Tyndarus, "good easy man," it appears, had to maintain them. They were educated at Pallena; and, as soon as they attained to years of maturity, they embarked with Jason, on board the good ship Argo, to go to Colchus in quest of the golden fleece.

In this expedition the two brothers behaved with superior courage. Pollux conquered and slew Amycus in the combat of the cestus, and was ever after considered the god and patron of those refined and polite accomplishments, ycleped boxing and wrestling. Castor, on his part, distinguished himself in the management of horses. Modern prize-boxers and horse-jockies are devout worshippers of these worthies; for the exercises of the ring and the turf are said to be twins amusements. These heroes also cleared the Hellespont and the neighboring seas of the pirates with which they were infested, from which circumstance they have always been deemed the friends of navigation. Why don't they protect our West India trade from such lawless freebooters? During the Argonautic expedition, (so called from the name of the ship in which they were embarked,) they were assailed by a violent storm, in the midst of which two flames of fire were seen to play round the heads of the twins. The tempest immediately subsided, and the sea became tranquil. From this occurrence their power to protect sailors has been more firmly credited; and the two mentioned flames, which are still very common in storms, have since been known by the name of Castor and Pollux:

"Fair Helen's brothers, whose bright glittering forms Rekindle hope amid the fiercest storms."

When both appear, it is considered a sign of fair weather; one only indicates an increase of the tempest.

Castor was finally killed by Idas, whom he had sought to injure in the tenderest point. Pollux, who was immortal, immediately avenged his brother's death by slaying Idas. He then entreated Jupiter either to restore Castor to life, or take away his own immortality, deprecating a separation as the greatest evil that could befall him. Jupiter compromised the matter, by permitting them to share the gift of immortality alternately between them; and, in order to reward this instance of fraternal affection, he made the two brothers constellations in the zodiac, under the name of Gemini, which never appear together, but when one rises the other sets, and so on alternately. The ship in which St. Paul was wrecked at the isle of Malta, (see Acts of the Apostles,) was called the Castor and Pollux, and was decorated with a double figure-head, representing the Spartan twins.

May in New-York makes her entrée under very peculiar circumstances. The great hive is then swarming, and half our population are "on the wing."

"At every door, behold the ready cart
Receive its cumbersome load; the horse throws round
A glance of meek compassion, which to me
Speaks in a language, plain as brutes can speak,
'What a poor fool is man!' His driver swears,
Wives scold, dogs bark, cats mew, and children cry,
Pots bang, chairs crack, pans ring, and jarring notes
Of harshest discord rise on every side.
There goes a matron with her looking-glass,
A legacy from mother to her child
For several generations, and she'll trust
None to remove it but her careful self.
But better had she stow'd it on the car
Where all her baggage rides; for fate has doom'd,
(By sudden contact with a porter's load,)
To dash the sacred treasures from her hand
On the unchristian pavement, where she views
Her scatter'd hopes in rude disorder spread,
Reflecting houses, passengers, and skies.
Here a full barrow, piled with feather-beds,
Push'd by a sturdy porter, runs you down,
Ere you can shun the danger; yonder goes
The sweatfog bearer of a precious load,
Baskets of china-ware, and sweetmeats-jars,
And the cold relics of some late repast.
And here, a lumbering cart moves slowly on Piled high with bureaus, bedsteads, tables, desks,
Chairs, cradle, rubbish, wash-tubs, kettles, pots,
Old empty barrels, benches, trammels, pans,
The fire utensils, carpet-rags, old books,
And musty pamphlets, oil-jugs, bottles, frames,
Mats, brooms, Dutch-ovens, gridirons, griddles, jacks,
Trunks, piggins, toasters, pickle-pots, and all.
'Tis bustle, tumult, noise, and sore dismay
Throughout the city; sleepless was the night,
And foodless is the day, for all must fast!
On every face is seen an anxious gloom,
From him who owns a half a dozen blocks,
Down to the humblest tenant of the least;
And e'en my favorite dog, with terror struck,
Gazes askance upon the troubled scene,
And sneaks to some lone corner for repose."

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 109.

I HAVE sometimes inquired of what use to me is the Little Genius. It is true that he has displayed a thousand specimens of enchanting power. He discloses the wondrous works of nature and of man. He visits me in the innumerable varieties of my moods and of my adventures. He has come in the hush of the starry midnight; in the soft beauty of the opening day; in the glare and dazzle and fashionable splendor of the crowded town; and in the green haunts of the odor-breathing and blossoming woods, where silence hangs like a spell upon the glen, the grove, and the valley, or only such sounds arise as put away from the weary soul all the fever and vain hope and idle affections which turn the thronged scenes of human life into a mockery—in all those opposite times and places, his voice has broken in upon my reveries, his smile has cheered my meditations—but I look in vain for any positive advantage from his influence. He invests me with no blessing; he puts not away from my path toil, weariness, and disappointment; he piles my floor with no golden treasures; he guides my solitary steps through the mazes of no fairy adventure; his visits are but as the dreams which cross my midnight slumber, and shed over the bleak path of life a momentary and fantastic glory, which passes utterly away with the shades of darkness.

As I wandered forth alone in the depth of the night, these thoughts were revolved in my mind. It was an hour almost too hushed and beautiful for the world. The moon was up and the stars, and there were no clouds but such as added splendor, with their silver shapes, to the glory of heaven. Sleep was upon the multitudes; and stillness, like that of a burial place, on the high dwellings of the great, and the humble sheds of the poor and wretched, on the broad street, and the decorated square. What magic is in the night. I am a different being under its thought-awakening influence. The stirring vicissitudes of day fill me with hope, fear, and passion; and my heart is overgrown with feelings, which then close up and shrink away, like the plant which withdraws its leaves from the touch; but in this strange time they unfolded themselves freely, and hope and interest gave place to memory. The reality was as a dream. The great world appeared like a story I had read of, fancy became the reality, and the Little Genius was before me.

"Wherefore, ungrateful student," said he, not with the severity of anger, but the gravity of anxious affection, "wherefore dost thou accuse thy friend? Where will rest thy ever-climbing wishes, when even the favors I have already shown thee but waken instead of satisfying thy restless desires? When I first selected thee from thy fellow-mortals, as my favorite and my friend, thou wast humble, melancholy, and hopeless. I listened to the whisperings of thy thoughts. Thou didst look around upon the wide arena, where the atoms of mortality were mingling together in love and warfare, and thy highest hope was one being on whom to pour out thy compressed and wasted affections. I appeared before thee and became thy friend. From my realms of light and power I have descended to cheer thy lonely chamber, to be the companion in thy obscure and melancholy walks, to reveal to thee hidden things of the past and the future; and I endeavored to arouse thee, by opening to thy understanding the nature of thy human situation, and nerving thee with a manly resolution to bear with firmness all the revolutions of fortune. What besides didst thou expect?"

"By enlarging my understanding," answered I, "thou hast inspired me with a knowledge of advantages which, by thy power, I might attain. In revealing the miseries of life thou hast also disclosed its blessings, and the one only shines more brightly from contrast with the other. Why hast thou broadened the sphere of my contemplations, and yet left my station the same?"

"Because," replied the Genius, "I would teach thee less how to gain pleasure than knowledge. I have labored to extinguish thy thirst after mere earthly gratifications, and to lift thee, in a measure, above sensual schemes. Instead of heaping thy floor with riches, I would enlighten thy mind with wisdom."

"But of what use is wisdom if it brings not happiness?"

"It guards thee," replied he, "against prostrating sorrow. It gives to thy life calmness and dignity, and enables thee to encounter death with tranquil composure, as a necessary and inevitable consequence. These are treasures better than gold; age confirms them, and renders them more valuable; and when the countless changes of external circumstances show the physical advantages of those whom the world term prosperous, to be unsatisfactory and evanescent, these grow into the character, give it a vigorous and healthy tone, which render you permanently contented, while others are only occasionally happy. To such a spirit life itself is enjoyment—to breathe the scented air, to mark the beauty of nature, to investigate the wonders of the universe, and to cherish those temperate and natural tastes, feelings, and affections for which sufficient food is found abundantly in the common path of life; even as the simple wild flower which peeps out by the road side, and excels in beauty the golden vase and sculptured marble. The civilized world teems with useless and sickly wishes, inconsistent with happiness and nature, by which man is rendered equally unfit to live and to die. Hence weariness to the great and want to the poor. Thou hast stood by the bed of the dying?"

"Even so," said I. "Youth, innocence, and beauty have so faded before me that I trembled to gaze; and the bright ethereal spirit hath grown dim and feeble in the manly form, and the warm features become cold and strange, till gushing tears blinded my eyes, as the faltering voice was hushed, and I bent in agony over icy death."

"Then hast thou marked the uses of adversity. All that is sorrow to thee now, dissolves a link of the chain that binds thy hopes to earth, therefore would I rather teach thee to endure than to avoid it. The hideous tyrant that breaks in with inexpressible horrors upon the delightful dreams of the happy, comes to the unfortunate more like a friend and benefactor. The momentary pang with which he pierces their bosoms is less acute than the gnawings of human disappointments; and when the gloomy abyss to which he points the spirit, is lightened by the rays of religion, if the victim cannot altogether check the startling fear, he sinks not in the darkness of despair. Although even thyself hast long since acknowledged that contentment is to be acquired rather by adapting the character to circumstances, than by attempting to realize the idle visions of fancy, in the ever-changing events of the world about thee, still thy passion is stronger than thy reason. Like the adventurer wrecked a thousand times on the ocean, thou wouldst trust again to its unstable billows."

"Yet does not he sometimes escape its perils, and receive profit from his daring?"

"Ay; and if you rate feelings and hopes as you do merchandise, imitate his example."

"Am I then," asked I, "for ever to abandon my search after happiness? Must I never expect to banish the causes of discontented feelings?"

"No; you should rather strive to overcome the feelings themselves by the conviction that the causes which excited them are found almost in the same degree in all situations. You are to seek satisfaction if not happiness in common things, and cease to repine at the accidents of an existence that is so fleeting. The miseries of a mortal are too often those of imagination. Happiness itself would tire him, for he would be haunted by wishes of fancy, and fancy has no bounds. Every thing in his possession would present to his mind desires, of which before he knew not the existence; therefore can you never be perfectly happy except in moments. Look in the mirror."

A sick boy was lying on a couch, in a darkened chamber. He seemed in pain, for his face was of a death-like hue—his lips quivered, and groans of anguish often escaped him.

"Oh," said he, "for the blessing of health. Wretch that I am, that fate should deny me so simple a boon."

As he spoke the pain left him, and the color came back into his cheeks, and he arose, and went forth over the fields and among the hills. Sometimes he paused to listen to the birds, or to look down into the water, and to breathe in the scented air as it blew over the blossoming trees and gardens. Suddenly he came to a spot of surpassing beauty, where a fine palace, surrounded with lofty groves, stood upon the bank of a river.

"Unhappy wretch!" he exclaimed, "what have I done that fate should strike me with the blight of poverty? What is the use of life without the means of enjoying it?"

By one of the innumerable caprices of fortune, the lordly dwelling became his, and he lunched into all the splendors of wealth. In the morning he chased the deer through his stately parks, and in the evening the glare of lights, the sound of laughter, and the bursts of inspiring music seemed to prove with what zest he tasted the gaieties of fashionable pleasure.

"Happy, happy man!" exclaimed I, "would that I also might—"

But the Genius beckoned me to observe a figure which issued from the illumined hall, and leaned with folded arms against one of the tall oaks which overshadowed the mansion.

I deemed him some unfortunate being who sickened with envy as he contemplated the splendor with which fate had invested his fellow-creature. But, as he raised his sad countenance, I perceived it was even the master of all this magnificence himself.

"My soul sickens," he murmured, "at this tedious riot and hollow joy. Without her, death were preferable to life. To fold my arms and look upon her face is a blessing—but to acquire her affections, and share with her this gorgeous scene, and all the glories in my possession, is more than I dare ask of fate."

A blooming girl, who had stolen out after him unperceived, startled him from his reveries. He knelt down before her, and poured out the feelings which had been swelling in his bosom. She frowned not upon him, and he thanked fate for having made him the happiest of men. But days passed away and he turned from her caresses. Again he stood in the shadow and mourned.

"Worthless creature that I am," he said, "wasting my existence in effeminate pleasures. Shame burns on my cheek, that like a boy I have been satisfied to bask in the glances of weak women, to dally with her silken ringlets, and listen to her idle words. There is nothing noble in my history. Obscurity wraps my name. I am enervated with mean pleasures, which pall on my taste and destroy the energy of my intellect."

Years fled away, and he went forth in battles, amid the roar of cannon, the clash of arms, the trampling of steeds, and the shrieks of the dying—and achieved mighty victories. His brow was bound with laurels, and poets and historians wrote his name in their everlasting tablets. The nation adored his heroic spirit and made him a king. And at length he sat on his throne, surrounded by the dazzling court, with princes and nobles watching the changes of his face—but time had wrinkled his forehead and silvered over his hair, and his limbs and his heart were chilled. And amid the bursts of martial music, while banners waved around, and the sun glanced from bright armor, I read the thoughts of his mind:

"Alas! alas!" such were the whispers of his secret soul, "what a mockery. Wherefore has fate plunged me into the tumult of this vainglory. Perhaps to-morrow these aged limbs will be laid in the dust."

"Complain no more," said the Genius, as the pageant faded away and we stood again alone in the hushed and silent moonlight of the deserted streets, "complain no more that I have been a useless friend. To awaken you to the conviction of one moral truth, will benefit you more than to pile your floor with gold, and realize your wildest wishes." F.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

REMARKS ON THE CHARACTER, CONDUCT, SITUATION, AND PROSPECTS OF those who live by the labor of their hands.

BY M. CAREY.

On the second and third opinions a few facts will suffice to convince the most sceptical of their destitution of foundation.

A primary element in this discussion is a consideration of the wages ordinarily paid to the class of persons whose case I attempt to develop, and whose cause I have undertaken to plead—and first, of the very numerous class, laborers on canals and turnpikes.

By the annexed letter from Joseph M'Ilvaine, Esq.,* formerly secretary of the board of canal commissioners, it appears that the average wages of this class in common times are from ten to twelve dollars per month and found; that in winter they may be had for five dollars; and that sometimes in that season, when labor is scarce, they work for their board alone.

It is important to observe, that in this and similar cases, averages do not afford a fair criterion to form a correct decision. This may at first glance appear unsound doctrine, but a very slight reflection will remove all doubt on the subject. Suppose A and B to work, the one at seven dollars and the other at

* Philadelphia, Feb. 14th, 1831.

DEAR SIR—It is difficult to answer with precision your inquiry as to the average wages of canal laborers. They vary with the seasons, and are still more dependent upon the proportion of laborers to the work required to be done. In the winter season men can be had at five dollars a month and found. In some cases I have known them work a whole winter for merely their food. On the contrary, at the busier periods of the year, fifteen to twenty dollars a month have been given when hands were scarce. I incline to think, however, that ten to twelve dollars a month and found, might be taken as a pretty fair average. Contractors, in making their calculations, set down seventy to seventy-five cents a day for each man employed, including wages and food. This would give about twelve dollars a month as the average of wages. Very respectfully, &c. J. M'ILVAINE M. CAREY, Esq.

ten—the average would be eight and a half. But would it be fair to calculate the capacity of A to support his family by this average? Surely not. The calculation must be made on his actual wages: I will therefore assume ten dollars for ten months, and five dollars for two, and take the case of a laborer with a wife and two children. Many of them have three and four.

10 months at 10 dollars.....	$100 00
2 months at 5 dollars.....	10 00
Suppose the wife to earn half a dollar per week--	26 00

Total..... 136 00

I now submit a calculation of the expenses of such a family, every item of which is at a low rate.

Shoes and clothes for self and wife, each 12 dollars	$24 00
Washing at the canal, 124 cents per week.....	6 50
Shoes and clothes for two children, each 8 dollars	16 00
Rent, 50 cents per week.....	26 00
Soap, candles, &c. 8 cents per week.....	3 12
Fuel, 15 cents per week.....	7 80
Meat, drink, vegetables, &c. 8 cents per day, } each, for wife and children.....	87 60

$171 02*

Deficit..... $35 02

This is one of a large class whom some of our political economists of the new school are not ashamed to stigmatize as worthless and improvident, because they do not, forsooth, save enough out of their miserable wages to support themselves and families in times of scarcity without the aid of benevolent societies, whereas it appears that their wages are inadequate to their support even when fully employed.

Here, let it be observed, there is no allowance for a single day in the whole year lost by accident, by sickness, or by want of employment—no allowance for expense arising from sickness of wife or children—no allowance for the contingency stated by Mr. M'Ilvaine, of working during the winter months for board alone. It is assumed that no unfavorable circumstance has taken place—that every thing has “run on with a smooth current,” and yet the man's earnings, and those of his wife, fall short of their support thirty-five dollars!

But we will present the case in another point of view. Suppose him to have twelve dollars per month for ten months, and five dollars for two—that his wife earns half a dollar per week—that neither of them loses a day by sickness or otherwise, and let us see the result.

10 months at 12 dollars each.....	$120 00
2 months at 5 dollars each.....	10 00
Wife's earnings per week, 50 cents.....	26 00

Expenditure as before.....

Even on this supposition he falls short fifteen dollars a year of a meagre support; what an overwhelming commentary on the idle and vapid declamations against the improvidence of the poor! and what an irresistible argument in favor of benevolent societies!

I am persuaded the allowance for food and drink is too low. The rations in prisons and almshouses are from five to eight cents per day. In those cases the supplies are furnished by contract, under the influence of eager competition. The articles are all purchased by wholesale, and on a large scale. How immense the difference between this case and that of the poor, who purchase all in the small way, and generally on credit, at a price enhanced by the risk run by the sellers. The difference in the price of wood may afford a tolerable specimen of the disadvantage under which the poor labor in their purchases. By the measurement of some wood recently purchased on a small scale, it appears that oak wood, sold out by three or four cents worth at a time, (the mode in which it is too generally purchased by the poor) produces from ten to twelve dollars per cord!

* I now give a statement in detail of the expenses of such a family per week, exclusive of clothes and rent, which, I trust, will be found moderate.

Bread.....	$0 624
Meat.....	30
Potatoes.....	15
Butter.....	15
Tea.....	10
Sugar.....	12
Milk.....	7
Salt, pepper, and vinegar.....	7
Fuel, soap, candles, &c.....	21

Per week..... $1 794

Per day, about..... 254

Although I have allowed fifty cents per week for the earnings of a wife, it must be obvious that a woman with two or three small children to attend, and making shirts for six, eight, ten, or even twelve and a half cents each, can contribute little to the support of a family. So far as regards canal laborers, the sickness and mortality among them form a painful drawback on the benefits mankind derive from their labors. It is not at all improbable, indeed it is almost certain, that among the whole number employed, five per cent. return to their families in the winter with broken constitutions, by fevers and agues, one-half of whom are carried off to an untimely grave. Those that escape this state, often linger for years in a state of debility, subject to occasional returns of their painful and enervating disorder.

I have too good an opinion of human nature, although by no means a believer in its perfection or perfectibility, to doubt that those speculative citizens, who have for years employed their time and their talents in denouncing the idleness, the worthlessness, and the improvidence of the poor, will, on a cool examination of the subject here presented to view, be filled with astonishment and deep regret at the infatuation, whereby they have attempted to dry the sources of charity and benevolence in the breasts of the rich, and, as far as in them lay, doomed the poor to remediless pauperism—an unholy and ungodly employment. To superior beings, looking down on human affairs, nothing can be a more just subject of amazement than a wealthy man, with an income of five, six, or seven thousand dollars a year, enjoying not only all the comforts but all the luxuries of life, and laying the four quarters of the globe under contribution for his raiment and the gratification of his appetite, who denies occasional relief to persons circumstanced as I have stated in the case cited, from a conscientious apprehension of injuring society by affording encouragement to idleness and improvidence! and nothing can be a more genuine subject of holy indignation than a wealthy person, not laboring under such a delusion, and yet refusing aid in such cases.

Calculations respecting city laborers, hod-men, wood-pilers, scavengers, and various other classes, whose sole dependence is on the casual employment of their hands, are attended with considerable difficulty. I have made inquiries of different persons, particularly of master-builders, as regards laborers and hod-men. Their statements vary extremely. One eminent builder, who employs a number of hands, states, that allowing for occasional heavy rains in spring, summer, and fall, and the partial suspension of building in winter, those persons are not sure of employment more than two hundred days in the year. This appears to be quite too low. Another, who states that wages vary from twenty-five to thirty-seven and a half cents per day in winter, and to sixty-two and a half, seventy-five, eighty-seven and a half, and one hundred cents, in spring, summer, and fall, assumes an average of sixty cents per day throughout the year. This again is apparently too low. Be this as it may, whatever the wages assumed of the various estimates, it will be manifest that the most rigid economy will not secure persons of the description in question from occasional distress, in the event of any of the calamities to which they are subject, that is, accidents, sickness, or want of employment, &c.

They are, however, a sufficiently near approximation to satisfy every candid mind of the enormous and pernicious errors which prevail on this subject.

When a laborer has a wife and only one child, or neither one nor the other, he undoubtedly fares well, and does not fall within the scope of this essay. When, on the other hand, he has a sickly wife, and three or four or five children, and is himself occasionally sick, his case is truly deplorable; and many of them have four, five, and six children. Their children are, I believe, generally more numerous than those of the rich.*

I might extend these views to greater lengths, and embrace various other occupations, which stand on nearly the same ground as those I have specified. But I presume it cannot be necessary, and hope I have established a point of infinite importance to the poor, and highly interesting to the rich—that is, that even among the occupations of males, there are some, which are so indifferently remunerated, that no industry—no economy—no providence, in times when the parties are fully employed, will enable them to save wherewith to support themselves and families in times of stagnation and during severe seasons; and that of course they must rely, on those occasions, upon the overseers of the poor, or benevolent societies, or charitable individuals, or on such extraordinary aid as, to the honor of our citizens, the late distressing winter called forth. If I succeed in deeply imprinting this important truth on the public mind, so that it may produce the proper effect, by removing the injurious prejudices that prevail on the conduct and character of the laboring poor, on the effects of benevolent societies, and on the claims of those societies for extensive support, I shall regard myself as signally fortunate.

* Let me here state a story, recorded, I believe, by Montaigne:—A lady who had been long married, and never had a child, paid a visit to one of her tenants, who had ten or eleven. The farmer's wife was complaining to the lady how hard she found it to provide for her numerous family; the lady soothingly said, “Be comforted, good woman; when God sends mouths he always sends meat.” “Yes, truly, my dear madam; but unfortunately he sends the meat to you, and the mouths to me.” Such is the case with many of our wealthy men, who are blessed with a superabundance of all the good things of this world, with few or no children—while many of our weavers and laborers, who have half-a-dozen, or a dozen, have not means to afford them proper nourishment.

There is one idea on the subject of benevolent societies, which deserves serious consideration, and appeals not merely to our charity and beneficence, but to our selfishness. It often happens that individuals who have for a long time struggled with distress and difficulties; and, with a laudable spirit of pride and self-respect, which cannot be too carefully cherished, shrunk from the degradation of a dependence on the guardians of the poor, are on the point of giving way in a time of severe pressure, but, being then temporarily relieved by a benevolent society, are rescued from this painful necessity; whereas they might otherwise sink into the state of permanent paupers, and ultimately cost the public ten times as much as the amount which produced this salutary result.

Let it not be for a moment supposed that I carry my defence of the poor to such an extravagant and ill-judged length as to contend that all their distresses and sufferings arise from inadequate wages, or that they are all faultless. Far from it. I know there are among them, as among all other classes, worthless persons—and some supremely worthless. Among the heavy sins of this class is that of desertion by some of them of their wives and children, or, what is equally bad, living in a state of idleness on the earnings of their wives. Indeed, so far as regards their ill-fated partners, the latter course is the worst. In the one case, the husband only withdraws his aid—in the other, he not only commits that offence, but adds to the burdens of his wife.

I venture to assert that so far as regards the sexes, among the poor there are twice as many worthless males as females; idle, dissipated, and intemperate. The females are, with few exceptions, orderly, regular, and industrious, and husband their slender means with exemplary economy—an economy without which they would frequently suffer from hunger.

From the most attentive examination and inquiry into the subject, I am fully satisfied that the worthless bear but a small proportion to those who are industrious and meritorious. Unfortunately the worthless occupy a more prominent space in the public eye, and with many are unceasing objects of animadversion and reprobation—their numbers and their follies and vices are magnified; whereas the industrious are always in the back ground, and out of view.

The industry of the laboring poor appears undeniable from the fact, that there is no occupation, however deleterious or disgraceful, at which there is any difficulty in procuring laborers, even at inadequate wages. The labor on canals in marshy situations, in atmospheres replete with pestilential miasmas, is full proof on this point. Although the almost certain consequence of laboring in such situations is a prostration of health and danger of life—and that no small portion of the laborers return to their families in the fall or winter with health and vigor destroyed, and laboring under protracted fevers and agues, which in many cases undermine their constitutions, and return in after years, and, as I have already stated, too often hurry them prematurely into eternity—their places are readily supplied by other victims who offer themselves on the altars of industry.

This is one of those decisive facts which ought to silence cavil for ever on this important subject.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Poems by Edgar A. Poe. 18mo. pp. 124. New-York. E. Bliss. 1831.

THE poetry of this little volume has a plausible air of imagination, inconsistent with the general indefiniteness of the ideas. Every thing in the language betokens poetic inspiration, but it rather resembles the leaves of the sybil when scattered by the wind. The annexed lines, which close a short poem, entitled the “Doomed City,” are less incomprehensible than most in the book, although the meaning is by no means perfectly clear:

But lo! a stir is in the air!
The wave! there is a ripple there!
As if the towers had thrown aside,
In slightly sinking, the dull tide—
As if the turret-tops had given
A vacuum in the filmy heaven:
The waves have now a redder glow—
The very hours are breathing low,
And when, amid no earthly moans,
Down, down that town shall settle hence,
Hell rising from a thousand thrones
Shall do it reverence,
And death to some more happy clime
Shall give his undivided time.”

It sometimes happens that poetry, at first sight unintelligible, is discovered, upon a repeated and more careful examination, to be fraught with the treasure of thought and fancy. The “Rime of the Ancient Mariner” belongs to this class; but we cannot flatter Mr. Poe with any similar hope respecting his own composition, although it occasionally sparkles with a true poetic expression, and sometimes a conflict of beauty and nonsense takes place, in which the latter seems to have the best of it. It is indeed encumbered by numerous obscurities, which we should be pleased to see either very much brightened or entirely expunged. What is the meaning of this?

"A heaven that God doth not condemn
With stars is like a diadem—
We liken our ladies' eyes to them."

Or these lines, (with which we close the article,) from "Fairy Land?"

"Huge moons—see! wax and wane
Again—again—again—
How they put out the starlight
With the breath from their pale faces!

Lo! one is coming down
With its centre on the crown
Of a mountain's eminence!
Down—still down—and down—
Now deep shall be—O deep!
The passion of our sleep!
For that wide circumference
In easy drapery falls
Drowsily over halls—
Over ruin'd walls—
Over waterfalls,
(Silent waterfalls!)
O'er the strange woods—o'er the sea—
Alas! over the sea!"

The Romance of History. France. By Lettice Ritchie. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 290, 247. New York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

These volumes are composed of a number of interesting stories—ingeniously imagined and well told, for the materials of which the author has drawn pretty copiously upon French history. His style is clear and rapid—but occasionally a little more swelling than the subject requires: and although he is far from being a copyist, it is easy to perceive, that while preparing his stories of chivalry, the strongly painted and unfolding pictures of Scott were in his imagination.

THE FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

EVERY one is surprised and delighted at the advancement we have made in music. It is to be hoped that painting will keep pace with its sister art, and enjoy an equal share of the public favor. In order that this desirable state of affairs may be produced, it is requisite that a certain degree of indulgence be extended towards the early efforts of the artists to present a number of original native pieces really worthy of admiration. The institution to which we now solicit the attention of our fellow-citizens, has just opened, for the sixth time, at Clinton-hall, in a room well calculated for the purpose; and the collection consists of the best which have been previously exhibited. Not being schooled in the mysteries of the art, we shall advert but briefly to the principal pieces, with the hope that our readers will feel sufficient interest in its prosperity, to attend and form their own opinions. We cannot, however, refrain from the remark, that the pleasure to be expected from the exhibition is greatly diminished by the fact, that instead of the higher order of pieces, the room is nearly filled with portraits, leaving the visitor to derive all the pleasure and profit which could be possibly gained from knowing that the gentleman in a very blue coat is Mr. Jenkins, and the lady with her hand bent over the back of the chair is Mrs. Jackson. The admission of a few heads, representing eminent individuals, is not objectionable; and there are several among those in question which, both as specimens of the art, and from the beauty or celebrity of the subjects, we should be sorry to lose; but, in general, to strangers, portraits are rather monotonous affairs, and should not be expected to interest out of the domestic circle. If the artist, who devotes himself to this branch, wishes, among other candidates, to display his success, let him paint public men or beautiful women, something to please the eye and awaken the imagination: of these Inman's Macready and Van Buren, and Ingham's Girl with Flowers and White Plume are examples.

No. 1. Portrait of Dr. Stamford. Mr. Morse. A fine likeness, and admirably painted.

2. Sunset. R. W. Wier. A quiet and delightful image of nature. The glow of the sun yet overspreads the cloudless heaven, and reflects a charming light over the landscape.

3. Moonlight view of Breakneck Mountain. R. Hoyle. There is a kind of beauty in the moonlight very difficult to represent on canvass. This is a fine night-scene, from a promising young artist.

4. Samson and Delilah. A. B. Durand. A very creditable design, and executed with much effect.

5. Full-length of a Little Girl with Flowers. Ingham. A fair, fresh, sweet face, and the form beautiful in the soft light shed down through the branches. The surrounding scenery is too sombre, and seems to have received little attention. It is to be regretted that the landscape could not be filled up and finished. The figure is charming. Look at her hat, filled with flowers. How light, fresh, and full of summer associations.

7. Subiding of the deluge. T. Cole. The grandeur of the subject strikes the mind with emotion, and the conception of the artist is highly poetic. The vast flood, gradually subsiding, leaves the peaked mountain tops visible; and the drenched world, as it again meets the light, has an air of deep solemnity and solitude extremely impressive. The effect is increased by the skull in the foreground. Fancy pictures the wretched relics, thus scattered beneath the waters.

10. The Last of the Mohicans. T. Cole. We have here the same richness of coloring and gorgeous portraiture of scenery for which this artist is peculiar.

13. Calvary, or the moment before the crucifixion. A composition of merit.

14. The Vintage. Mr. Weir discovers a fine taste in selecting subjects; he not only chooses charming scenes, but he bathes them in the most pleasing light. His pieces are full of expression, and are clearly the offspring of one familiar with the wood, the mountain, and the river, in all their shapes and moods, and imbued with a true sense of the beautiful things in nature. This feeling, which is the common fountain from which both painter and poet draw their materials, in this instance, as well as in most others, is closely allied to a perception of the ludicrous. We can trace these through all his productions—in the Sunset view, the luxuriant beauty of the Vintage, Don Quixote, the Dying Greek, the Antiquary, the Merry Wives of Windsor, Red Jacket, the Greek Boy, Family Groupe, and in all his finished and delightful landscapes. The Don Quixote is ludicrous in the extreme. The Dying Greek is a brilliant picture, and bears a prolonged examination. There is a fine sweetness in the face of the young girl in the "Antiquary," which makes Lovel's situation an enviable one; the Merry Wives of Windsor is truly Shakespearian, and we hope will be succeeded by many others of the same description. The gentlemen who have confined themselves to portraits will at once perceive the obvious superiority of Mr. Weir's subjects.

19. Monument of Prince Caraccioli.

27. Ahasuerus and Esther and Capuchin Charity. G. Marniglia. The effect of a stream of light in a darkened hall is finely displayed in these three pictures.

24. The detection of Harry Wharton. Dunlap. A very good subject, and well executed.

25. Portrait of a Race-horse. A. Fisher. This artist is celebrated for his skill in portraying animals. There are several fine specimens of this in the Academy.

39. Full length of Mr. Macready as William Tell. Inman. A celebrated piece; full of fire. The coloring is plain and natural; and the spectator must admire the haughty grandeur of attitude, and the fierce and lofty hate glaring from his features. By its side (31) is the White Plume. Ingham. A face to be gazed on with bended knee. It is a seducing vision of female loveliness, as soft and soothing as the other is vehement and ferocious. The shadow of a graceful bonnet never fell on a countenance more radiant and beautiful. How perfectly unclouded the features; how lightly the tresses repose on the soft shoulder; what a brilliancy of complexion; a mouth which you wish to fold your arms and gaze on forever, instead of going back to bargaining and business; and the eyes blue and beaming—

"Oh! he who knows
His heart is weak, of heaven should pray
To guard him from such eyes as those."

We do not pretend to judge whether these bright and very highly-finished portraits by Ingham are precisely what they ought to be; but, as a colorist, he has no superior within our knowledge. His faces are not only perfectly soft and brilliant, but animated and expressive.

The Garden of Eden. A well known picture. T. Cole. Both conception and execution splendid—an assemblage of the most beautiful features of nature. The distant mountains, the deep rich verdure of the valley, the transparent river, now tumbling over the rocks, and now stealing quietly through the green and shaded recesses of the forest, form a landscape of gorgeous luxuriance, imbued with the very spirit of repose, beauty, and happiness, and awakening the mind to a thousand delightful associations.

33. Portrait of Miss Clara Fisher. Inman. A charming piece, characteristic of both the artist and subject, and a spirited resemblance of this favorite and gifted young actress.

40. Groupe of three figures. A study for the Christ Rejected. Dunlap. One of the happiest of this artist's contributions.

45. The Young Drummer. A. L. De Rose. There is an improvement visible in the works of Mr. De Rose. The full-length of a gentleman and horse (No. 138) is quite prettily done. This style of portraits is effective. He should, however, occupy himself with some original subject for the next exhibition.

55. Boys quarreling after school. W. S. Mount. A humorous delineation, and eminently successful.

105. View of Galeta Island, in the Mediterranean. A. J. Bennet. Water colors. An almost living transcript of life. Observe the bend of the vessel, as it cuts through the waves, and the natural color of the water.

124. The Dead Child. F. S. Agate. Much effect is given to the body of the infant.

130. Full-length portrait of the Hon. Mr. Van Buren. Inman. A very faithful likeness of the ex-secretary, but already familiar to our readers.

139. Cattle piece. One of Fisher's quiet and luxuriant glimpses of nature in her better moments. It is pervaded by a delightful languor, and the gaze rests on it with pleasure.

140. Portrait of an old Revolutionary Soldier. J. Freeman. Small, but invaluable for its characteristic expression. The face is full of meaning.

We have not given a very extended account or particular enumeration of all the pictures in the Academy, as most of them, having been presented at previous exhibitions, are known to the public. It is a rule of the institution that only such works of living artists shall be received as have never before been exhibited; but at the expiration of every sixth year, selections are made from the preceding, and the present is intended as one of those reviews of the progress of our artists. We have no doubt this collection will be attended by numerous visitors, and that the art of painting will receive a new impulse from this appeal to the liberality of our fellow-citizens.

NEW MUSIC.

Professors and amateurs will be pleased to learn that Bourne has now in the course of publication, the entire score of Cinderella, which may be obtained either in single pieces or in a connected form. A number have been already issued, among which are the following:—the "Overture," "Once a king," "Morning its sweets is flinging," "What demon's opposing malice," "Swift as the flash," "Let thine eyes on mine mildly beaming," "Sir, a secret," "Now with grief no longer bending," and "the Grand March." These are printed on a variety of the most costly colored paper, and in beauty and accuracy, excel any thing of the kind which has come under our notice. Nothing can be more desirable at the piano, than the entire music of a fine opera, and no American publisher has hitherto been found sufficiently enterprising to try this experiment upon the public taste and liberality. To Bourne is therefore due the credit of first presenting us with a copy of a complete opera. The truth is, that notwithstanding all that has been said in his praise, his great services to the cause of music have scarcely yet been justly appreciated. Under his direction this branch of the fine arts has been brought to great perfection; and, as its principal impulse has been derived from him, it is but fair that he should reap the reward. In addition to the foregoing, this indefatigable publisher has issued, in his usual style, and with appropriate vignettes, the "Sicilian Knight," from the opera of Rekeby, and the "Mellow Horn," composed and sung by Mr. Jones. Also, "Merrily, merrily sound the bells," from the American, Miss Clara Fisher's fine ballad, "Behave yourself before folk," and the favorite airs of Cinderella, arranged as cotillions by Signor Pons.

THE DRAMA.

Mr. Forrest is the principal attraction at the Park theatre. He was welcomed with the warmest approbation in Metamora, which he sustained with his usual ability. Strong as are the claims of this universally popular tragedian upon the public attention, from his intrinsic excellence as a performer, they are considerably enhanced by his exertions to elicit the dramatic talent of the country. Of the tragedy which he is about to produce during his next engagement, report speaks very favorably. The Lion of the West and the Moderns were repeated, for the benefit of Mrs. Hackett, on Saturday, to a full house. A singularly stupid affair was also enacted on the same occasion, with the laudable design of introducing a man as a monkey, Mr. Richings as a sailor, Mr. Woodhull as an African gentleman, whose morals appear to have been sadly neglected, and a goat in his own character! As the principal part of this highly tragic piece seems to have been composed extemporaneously by the dramatis personæ, it would be scarcely just to criticize it; but one of the soliloquies of Mr. Woodhull, and the facetious dialogue between Mr. Blakely and Mr. Richings, about the "backey," were so disgustingly true to nature, that we seemed rather in the lowest place of vulgar resort, than within the first theatre of the Union. The poor little goat was positively ashamed of himself to be seen in such company. He came on with evident reluctance, and made his final exit immediately. We trust the Park theatre will not be disgraced by a repetition of this silly trash.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PASSAGES FROM MISS SHADOW'S JOURNAL.

April 14. Rainy and cloudy—felt capricious and changeable—as much like the weather as possible. Looked out of the window, yawned, played backgammon, and was beaten six times in succession, drank tea at an early hour, and being in no expectation of seeing Henry, inasmuch as he was some hundred miles off, went to bed as the clock struck eight. N. B. First time I have been to bed before twelve these three months.

April 15. Miss Evergreen's magnificent party in the evening. Henry not there, but as it was no fault of mine, thought myself at liberty to be amused. Colonel Hunt had the honor to dance with me three times—and he is handsome—there is no denying it. That brainless Spencer insisted upon the pleasure, but I was always sure to be engaged six sets in advance. Think, upon the whole, it was hardly proper for me to waltz so much with Tom Meredith when H. is away. But then we were at school together, and have been old friends so long. H. hates him like—but no matter, he shall know nothing about it.

April 16. Nothing to do, and exerted myself so much as to read two pages of some French melanges. Found there an anecdote of Le Brun. He met an old beggar, with long matted locks, and an exceedingly thick, bushy beard, and said to him, "My good fellow, come to my house to-morrow, for I should like to paint you." The beggar shaved his beard and combed his hair, and the next day called upon Le Brun. "Ah, friend," said the painter, "what the deuce have you been about? You have ruined your bristling hair and your shaggy beard, and your beauty is entirely spoilt." Reminded me of Miss Legere before she had been circulated at all in society. Rough, red-haired, and ill-attired; next day with black hair; (!) and, by Mrs. Sylvester's skill and taste, metamorphosed into quite a decency.

April 17. Tom Meredith offered himself, and requested me to elope. It would occasion quite an excitement, to be sure, but I stood upon my dignity, and told him to disappear.

April 18. H. returned—delighted to see me. Walked Broadway with him, the envy of every woman I met. He is the finest looking creature ever born. Passed Tom, and bowed very cordially. His request was a compliment to my beauty rather than my principle. Poor fellow, I hope he will not die of disappointment.

April 19. Those three Misses Blight are the vilest creatures on earth. They go round in a body to pay calls, and make everybody feel uncomfortable that comes near them. Nothing but scandal and backbiting. Insult my friends and me over their shoulder. Pert, conceited, insolent, and ill-bred—if they ever cross my door-step again, shall be very much disposed to forbid them the house.

April 20. A letter from H. Tells me during his absence I have been flirting desperately with half-a-dozen single gentlemen, and consequently he must break off the connection. For this I am probably indebted to the Misses Blight. Heigho! Weather quite capricious.

April 21. Married Tom Meredith. Beautiful day, and I am no longer Miss Shadow.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES ON LAKE ST. CHARLES,

LOWER CANADA.

My bark-canoë is on the lake,
The moon upon the flood is shining,
And gentle winds the forest shake
Where pine and beech their boughs are twining.
The blue jay on the maple sleeps,
The clamorous night-hawk cries alone
Where fire-flies quiver round the steep
Bright flashing like the diamond stone.
And the low voice of winds glides there
As if by harps Æolian sung;
Soft murmurs steal along the air
In tones from hill to valley flung.
The cedar green—the weeping yew
Their shadows cast upon the floods;

The mournful gale comes sighing too,
And wakes the echoes of the woods.

But while our paddles break the waves,
And the pale moon lights up the scene,
Far other thoughts my bosom craves
Than those of solitude I ween.
A pensive sigh for home is there—
A sigh for friends I ne'er may see—
For friends who may forget to share,
Perchance, their hallowed thoughts with me!

What memories to my bosom cling
Of joys that ne'er may smile again,
The bright buds of life's blooming spring,
That crowd like visions on my brain.
The glees of youth I taste once more,
I see the fields I went to roam,
I hear the songs I sung of yore,
Dear relics of a by-gone home!

Home? ah! I am among the lakes—
The woods—the wilds—the hills—my dream
Hath been a mockery, which awakes
Delusive smiles that idly gleam.
Away, dark thought, too much of wo,
Albeit, warps the path of life!
I would the pensive theme forego,
And fling a sunshine over strife.

Row on—row on, my Indian boy,
Let hope our flickering beacon be—
The faintest hope permits of joy
And kindles up life's apathy.
See! Kamouraka's lake is blue,
And stars are playing on its tide;
The mighty woods their unbrage too
Are flinging o'er the waters wide!

Row on, Pecôri—thou art the child
Of nature's solitude—unborn
For aught but thoughts of rude and wild,
A chief in thy own realm forlorn!
How often by this ancient pine
Reposed thy bands in days gone by!
The chase—the dance—the song—all thine—
Bright glories of thy liberty!

Row on, Pecôr. The woods are still
Where erst thy whoop from ambush broke,
Where nations met to feast or kill,
As songs of death the night awoke!
The land you tread was all your own,
Your friends the beast—the bird—the tree;
But now the desert hears your groan,
As wailing to its wilds ye flee!

We are the fierce o'erwhelming wave
That sweeps ye from the wilderness!
And we will leave ye but a grave
Of all this mighty land, I wis!
Your foot-print marks the distant hill,
The far wood echoes to your wrong,
And ocean answers to its thrill
In many a deep funeral song.

Row on—the moon is set. The sky
Is dark. The wind is in the bowers.
The mighty hemlock groans. A sigh
Comes whispering through the couch flowers.
Their scarlet blossoms catch the dew
Where sumach-berries kiss the wave.
How calm the wave! How silent too!
Blue emblem of the peaceful grave!

THE VAMPIRE TO HIS VICTIM.

Written after seeing Mr. Barry's able personation of that character in the "Bride of the Isles."

Once more the dread alternative,
The dark, the fatal hour is nigh,
When I the sacrifice must give,
Doomed yearly for my guilt to die;
Or all that yet of life remains
Must vanish from these withered veins.

And thou, the loveliest of all,
Who, e'er the year's last moon is set,
By my accursed hand must fall—
How short a time is left thee yet;
Sweet Margaret! and must thou die
For one so guilty, lost, as I?

The all of heart that yet remains
To throb within this wizard form
Which yet a demon's soul contains,
Shrinks from the task I must perform;
Yes, beautiful unfortunate!
The heart that wills, laments thy fate!

But see! the moon's descending rays
Shed o'er the wave their fatal smile—
A sight that blasts my frenzied gaze,
Margaret! thy doom is fixed the while!
Yes, thou must perish ere too late,
Or one dark moment seals my fate.

THYRA.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Monuments.—A correspondent requests information respecting the monument of Washington which was to have been erected in the Bowling-green. We are unable to enlighten him upon the subject. Such a measure has been, during several years, an occasional topic of conversation; but whether it was to depend on private subscription, or a resolution of the common council, and whether the design is still in contemplation, we cannot say. The New-Yorkers are not much given to this species of public ornament; and we suspect the immortal defender of our liberties will live only "in the hearts of his countrymen," unless the statue could be made a matter of speculation, a company incorporated with banking privileges, and the stock-holders entitled to the proceeds of exhibiting it for the first thirty years. Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore are all much before us in this respect. Even the solitary monument erected in Trinity church-yard to the memory of Captain James Lawrence, has been suffered to fall into decay. Little is done here from the spirit of public improvement, separate from private interest, and there is no reason to hope that the statue in question will be raised in this city. We are informed that our friends in Connecticut have completed the "Groton monument," in memory of the storming of Fort Griswold. It stands near the old fort, opposite the centre of New-London, one hundred and thirty feet above tide water. It is said to be of great height, and to command a fine and extensive prospect.

The first of May.—A stranger must be forcibly struck with the ludicrous custom of our fellow-citizens, visible in the general anarchy which ushers in this month. When the Russians were evacuating Moscow, what would they have said, had they been told that the inhabitants of a city, containing a population of more than two hundred thousand, annually volunteered to endure nearly equal confusion, in an almost universal change of domicile? Much ridicule has been attached to this custom, but it is, in many instances, the result of an injudicious increase of the rent by the landlords. A light article upon the subject of this month, from the pen of a favorite correspondent, will be found in another page.

Business hand-writing.—Mr. Ely is deservedly celebrated for his superiority in teaching the art of writing, as well as for his own skilful and rapid powers of execution. He is, without doubt, one of the most adroit of chirographers, and has an inimitable off-hand way of decorating albums, visiting-cards, diplomas, and marriage-certificates, which ladies and gentlemen who are in want thereof, would do well to examine. As all young ladies keep albums, and most gentlemen are addicted to fits of poetic inspiration, and at some time or other compelled to "write themselves" dull fellows, for the gratification of Miss Juliana Tomlinson, or other fair admirers of native talent, they had better call on Ely, in some of their lucid intervals, and learn to express their sentiments in intelligible characters. We have read somewhere of a gentleman who used three different kinds of penmanship, one of which only he and his clerk could read, the other only himself could understand, and the third neither he nor his clerk, nor any body else, could decipher. This latter style of chirography, to judge from the manuscripts of our correspondents, is the prevalent one; and if from such a chaos of materials, Mr. Ely can produce any thing resembling order and legibility, the printers of the city should pay him honor, return him a vote of thanks, and give him a public dinner.

The legitimate drama.—A Mr. Farnes is amusing the lovers of the drama in England, by placing a real donkey alive on the top of a ladder, and balancing the same on his chin, without any deception. The admirers of a certain style of theatricals would be gratified by the importation of these two interesting animals into this country, "to wake the soul by tender strokes of art," &c. It would cast even the graces of Mushapug, the monkey, noticed in a previous paragraph, into the shade.

Laboring classes.—An English nobleman, (the earl of Shrewsbury) in a sensible pamphlet, lately published, has suggested several plans for improving the condition of the poorer classes in England. We have read extracts from the work well deserving attention.

March of improvement.—The grand sultan has issued a decree forbidding the Turks to address Christians with the usual appellation of "dog." "It is really gratifying to find one's self properly appreciated."

Turkish honesty.—Tournefort says, "Children may be sent to market in Constantinople with perfect safety if they can only ask for what they want." No one will impose upon them by taking too much.

A CHAPTER ON CORPORATION DINNERS.

BY THE LAST OF THE KNICKERBOCKERS.

OF late years there has been a great deal said about civic feasts; and because, forsooth, the fathers of this good city spend the trifling sum of five thousand dollars annually for wine, turtle, venison, and such other absolute necessities as they may be fond of, the papers, (or rather the lean and hungry conductors of them) cry out against those lovers of good cheer, and keepers up of hearty old customs, as if they had never before heard of such an affair as a corporation dinner! Indeed, however incredible it may seem, it is said that a bilious-looking editor of one of the daily papers, was actually heard to declare that he doubted much whether the common council were justified in appropriating two thousand dollars for a fourth of July dinner! I hear, likewise, that a conspiracy has been organized for the purpose of doing away with those relics of by-gone days, when the portly aldermen and their rotund assistants, the fat little schepens, (whence have sprung the assistant aldermen of these degenerate times) could eat and drink as often and as much as they pleased for the good of their country, and that too, when no person had the hardihood to question their right to do so. Now it would be much more mannerly in editors to publish the feats of the different persons at the various dinners; describing and applauding, after the fashion of Homer, the manner in which alderman A. swallowed turtlesoup, or in which alderman B. devoured venison; condemning, at the same time, the irresolution and comparative indifference with which alderman C. carved the haunch. These accounts would be much more acceptable to the citizens, than the dull "reports of the common council," which grace the periodicals of the day, and consist of pithy touches of eloquence upon the moral obligation of not cleaning the streets, or on the necessity of having the people's land taken from them, and their necks broken into the bargain, that a few speculators may sell off their lots to advantage. Although the inhabitants of this community cannot be present to assist in the great masticatory feats so frequently performed by the common council in their service, (deeds of derring do, as Walter Scott hath it) they would, nevertheless, be gratified to know in what manner, and for what things their money is expended. But alas! the honest old times of Dutch hilarity have passed away for ever. Even as the Indians, stern, sad, and silent, are gradually disappearing from the scene of their former glory, so are the contented, comfortable, and pipe-smoking descendants of the Hollanders, now seen but seldom in the busy thronged streets of this contentious city. Bear with me, lovely and gentle reader, whose eye peruseth these my impotent murmurings against the decrees of destiny, bear with me in my melancholy contemplations. I am the last of the happiest race of human beings, around whose broad and honest countenances ever curled the blue wreathed smoke of the luxurious and fragrant Havana. In my sunny youth these regions were the abode of peace, quiet, and plenty. The newfangled disturbers of human happiness, metaphysics, belles, rail-roads, dandies, and operas were unknown. The buxom sun shed his warming beams on our quiet gardens and simple dwellings, and our lives glided on their course like a clear and gentle river, whose waters flow on dreamily through fields of rich clover, groves of locusts and oaks, and meadows waving with the golden harvest. Alas! alas! my head is silvered over with time—my once contented visage is seamed and stamped with wrinkles—my eyes grow dim, and my hands tremble as I write. I look abroad upon nature as on a sweet friend from whom I am soon to part forever; and when the weary sun, whose jolly face once lighted me only to hope and happiness, rests his red disk on the western horizon, and flings a sad farewell glance over the world, before he sinks gradually from my sight, "Thus," I think, "after a few more hours will I descend into my grave, and oblivion, like the shadows of evening, shall rest upon my name." Yet, reader, is my bosom warmed with old recollections. Yet a tinge of shame suffuses my withered cheeks when I behold the narrow spirit which would abolish the hospitable customs of my fathers, and a tear swells silently in mine eye when I compare the dignified, peaceable, and profound stillness of the former rulers of Mannahatta, with the bargain-driving, speculating, street-opening, house-shifting race of their descendants. Listen, fellow-citizens, listen to the voice of age and wisdom, and be not ashamed, ye electioneering, speechifying politicians of the rising generation, to adopt the advice of an old man whose pilgrimage is almost completed, and who can, therefore, be influenced by no interested motive in pointing out to you the path of propriety and justice. In your future contests for aldermen and their schepens, put in none but men of portly bodies, and great eaters withal, and do your best to keep out of office all aspiring patriots with pale faces and little appetites, who, in general, are notorious friends of business, opposed to squandering money, and likewise enemies to good cheer. POISONING A STILETTO.

In a private collection at Florence, among other remarkable pictures of females, I was particularly struck with one representing a very beautiful and richly dressed girl poisoning a stiletto. The story that follows is the tradition attached to it.

She was of noble rank, and nature gave
At birth a noble spirit; and the blood
Mantled her cheek, and her dark eye flashed fire
At mention of unworthiness; and love
Was a deep passion, and neglect—despair.
Long had she loved him; his society
Was her sole happiness; and in his fame
And glory was her joy; and in his love
She had wrapped up her heart and soul and life.
But he has wronged her deeply, for his vows
Were basely broken, and her many dreams
Of after happiness, and hopes of bliss,
Were turned to darkness by his faithlessness.

And she who loved so deeply, and gave up
Her feeling and her fondness to a heart
That was unworthy and unkind—can hate.
The heart that lived in its own fervent love—
Is burning with the purpose of revenge.
The lip that whispered gentleness has learned
To mutter curses, and the delicate hand,
White as the snow, soft as the cygnet's down,
Is stained by tampering with unholy things.
Her brow has lost its smoothness, and her eye
Gleams with the fire of death.

The hour is come,
When he, the false one, shall lead forth his bride,
The fairest maid in Florence, to the altar,
Where he will pledge to her his perjured vows.
And there is joy in all the palaces—
And gaiety on every careless brow—
And smiling gladness in all hearts—but one.

And is all this to make the sacrifice
Only more splendid? Is the joyous music
Only to sadden to a darker strain,
And breathe a death-dirge for a marriage hymn?
Ay! in her bridal robes, in the fond hour
That was to consummate her promises,
And give her to the husband that she loved—
Wo for the dying! Bring the sad pale flowers
To strew above her bier, and deck her grave!
And is it then that woman's gentleness
Can be thus changed to madness?—Ask the dead!

ORIGINAL TALES.

A LEGEND OF AMSTERDAM.

From a Dutch manuscript.

EVERY body has heard of St. Nicholas, that honest Dutch saint, whom I look upon as having been one of the most liberal, good-natured little fat fellows in the world. But strange as it may seem, though everybody has heard, nobody seems to know anything about him. The place of his birth, the history of his life, and the manner in which he came to be the dispenser of new-year cakes, and the patron of good boys, are matters that have hitherto not been investigated, as they ought to have been long and long ago. I am about to supply this deficiency, and pay a debt of honor which is due to this illustrious and obscure tutelary genius of the jolly new-year.

It hath often been justly remarked that the birth, parentage, and education of the most illustrious personages of antiquity are usually enveloped in the depths of obscurity. And this obscurity, so far from being injurious to their dignity and fame, has proved highly beneficial; for as no one could tell who were their fathers and mothers on earth, they could the more easily claim kindred with the skies, and trace their descent from the immortals. Such was the case with Saturn, Hercules, Bacchus, and others among the heathens; and of St. George, St. Dennis, St. Andrew, St. Patrick, and the rest of the tutelaries—I speak it with great respect and reverence—it may justly be said that nobody would ever have heard of their progenitors but for the renown of their descendants. It is, therefore, no reflection on the respectable St. Nicholas that his history has hitherto remained a secret, and his origin unknown.

In prosecuting this biography, and thus striving to repay my obligations for divers, and I must say unmerited favors received from this good saint, after whom I was christened, I shall refrain from all invention or hyperbole, seeking the truth industriously, and telling it simply and without reserve or embellishment. I scorn to impose on my readers with cock and bull stories of his killing dragons, slaughtering giants, or defeating whole armies of pagans with his single arm. St. Nicholas was a peaceful, quiet, orderly saint, who, so far as I have been able to learn, never shed a drop of blood in his whole life, except, peradventure, it may be possible he sometimes cut his finger, of which I profess to know nothing, and, therefore, contrary to the custom of biographers, shall say nothing.

St. Nicholas was born—and that is all I can tell of the matter—on the first of January; but in what year or at what place, are facts which I have not been able to ascertain, although I have investigated them with the most scrupulous accuracy. His obscurity would enable me to give him a king and queen for his parents, whereby he might be able to hold up his head with the best of them all—but, as I before observed, I scorn to impose such doubtful, to say no worse, legends upon my readers.

Nothing is known of his early youth, except that it hath come down to us that his mother dreamed, the night before his birth, that the sun was changed into a vast new-year cake and the stars into oily cooks—which she concluded was the reason they burnt so bright. It hath been shrewdly intimated by certain would-be antiquaries, who doubtless wanted to appear wiser than they really were, that because our worthy saint was called Nicholas, that must of course have been the name of his father. But I set such conjectures at naught, seeing that if all the sons were called after their fathers, the distinction of senior and junior would no longer be sufficient, and they would be obliged to number them as they do in the famous island of Nantucket, where I hear there are thirty-six Isaac Coffins and sixteen Pelegs.

Now, of the first years of the life of good St. Nicholas, in like manner, we have been able to learn nothing until he was apprenticed to a baker in the famous city of Amsterdam, after which this metropolis was once called, but which my readers doubtless know was christened over again when the English usurped possession, in the teeth of the great right of discovery derived from the illustrious navigator, Henorus Hudson, who was no more an Englishman than I am.

Whether the youth Nicholas was thus apprenticed to a baker on account of his mother's dream, or from his great devotion to new-year cakes, which may be inferred from the fact that he was called Nicholas, I do not know, but he was so apprenticed, and that is sufficient to satisfy all reasonable readers. As for those pestilent, curious, prying people, who want to know the why and wherefore of every thing, we refer them to the lives of certain famous persons, which are so intermingled and confounded with the lives of their contemporaries, and the events, great and small, which happened in all parts of the world during their sojourn on the earth, that it is utterly impossible to say whose life it is we are reading. Many people of little experience take the title-page for a guide, not knowing, peradventure, they might almost as safely rely upon history for a knowledge of the events of past ages.

Little Nicholas, our hero, was a merry, sweet-tempered catiff, which was, doubtless, somewhat owing to his living almost altogether upon sweet things. He was marvellously devoted to cakes, and ate up numberless gingerbread alphabets before he knew a single letter.

Passing over the intermediate years, of which, indeed, I know no more than the man in the moon, I come to the period when, being twenty-four, and the term of his apprenticeship almost out, he fell desperately in love with the daughter of his worthy master, who was a burgomaster of forty years standing. In those unprecocious times, the boys did not grow to be men and the girls women, so soon as they do now. It would have been considered highly indecent for the former to think of falling in love before they were out of their time, or the latter to set up for young women before they knew how to be any thing else. But as soon as the worthy Nicholas arrived at the age of twenty-four, being, as I said, within a year of the expiration of his time, he thought to himself that Katrinchee, or Katherine, as the English call it, was a clever, notable little soul, and eminently calculated to make him a good wife. This was the main point in the times of which I am speaking, when people actually married without first running mad either for love or money.

Katrinchee was the toast of all the young bakers of Amsterdam, and honest Nicholas had as many rivals as there were loaves of bread in that renowned city. But he was as gallant a little Dutchman as ever smoked his way through the world pipe foremost, and did not despair of getting the better of his rivals, especially as he was a great favorite with the burgomaster, as indeed his conduct merited. Instead of going the vulgar way to work, and sighing and whining out romance in her ear, he cunningly, being doubtless inspired by Cupid himself, proceeded to insinuate his passion, and make it known by degrees, to the pretty little Katrinchee, who was as plump as a partridge, and had eyes of the color of a clear sky.

First did he bake a cake in the shape of a heart pierced half through by a toasting-fork, the which he presented her smoking hot, which she received with a blush and did eat, to the great encouragement of the worthy Nicholas. A month after, for he did not wish to alarm the delicacy of the pretty Katrinchee, he did bake another cake in the shape of two hearts, entwined prettily with a true lover's knot. This too she received with a blush, and did eat with marvelous content. After the expiration of a like period, he did contrive another cake in the shape of a letter, on which he had ingeniously engraven the following couplet:

"Wer diesen glauben wöht, hat die veranft verschworen, Dem denken abgesagt sein eigentham verlohren."

The meaning of which, if the reader doth not comprehend, I do hereby earnestly advise him to set about studying the Dutch language forthwith, that he may properly appreciate its hidden beauties.

Little Katrinchee read this posey with a sigh, and rewarded the good Nicholas with a look which, as he afterwards affirmed, would have heated an oven.

Thus did the sly youth gradually advance himself in the good graces of the little damsel, until at length he ventured a downright declaration in the shape of a cake made in the exact likeness of a little Dutch Cupid. The acceptance of this was conclusive, and was followed by permission to address the matter to the decision of the worthy burgomaster, whose name I regret hath not come down to the present time.

The good man consulted his pipe, and after six months hard smoking came to a conclusion that the thing was feasible. Nicholas was a well-behaved, industrious lad, and the burgomaster justly concluded that the possession of virtuous and industrious habits without houses and lands, was better than houses and lands without them. So he gave his consent like an honest and ever to be respected magistrate.

The news of the intended marriage spoiled all the bread baked in Amsterdam that day. The young bakers were so put out that they forgot to put yeast in their bread, and it was all heavy. But the hearts of the good Nicholas and his bride were as light as a feather notwithstanding, and when they were married it was truly said there was not a handsomer couple in all Amsterdam.

They lived together happily many years, and nothing was wanting to their felicity but a family of little chubby boys and girls. But it was ordained that he never should be blessed with any offspring, seeing that he was predestined to be the patron and benefactor of the children of others, not of his own. In good time, and in the fullness of years, the burgomaster died, leaving his fortune and his business to Nicholas, who had ever been a kind husband to his daughter, and a dutiful son to himself. Rich and liberal, it was one of the chief pleasures of the good Nicholas to distribute his cakes, of which he baked the best in all Amsterdam, to the children of the neighborhood, who came every morning, and sometimes in the evening; and Nicholas felt his heart warm within his bosom when he saw how they ate and laughed, and were as happy, ay, and happier too, than any little kings. The children all loved him, and so did their fathers and mothers, so that in process of time he was made a burgomaster, like his father-in-law before him.

Not only did he entertain the jolly little folk of the city in the manner heretofore described, but his home was open to all travellers and sojourners who had no other home, as well as those who came recommended from afar off. In particular the good pilgrims of the church, who went about preaching and propagating the true faith, by the which I mean the doctrines of the illustrious reformers in all time past.

The good Nicholas had in the latter part of his life, embraced these doctrines with great peril to himself, for sore were the persecutions they underwent in those days who departed from the crying abominations of the ancient church, and had it not been for the good name he had established in the city of Amsterdam, among all classes, high and low, rich and poor, he might, peradventure, have suffered at the stake. But he escaped, as it were by a miracle, and lived to see the truth triumph at last even throughout all the land.

But before this came to pass his faithful and affectionate helpmate had been taken from him by death, sorely to his grief; and he would have stood alone in the world had it not been for the little children, now grown up to be men and women, who remembered his former kindness, and did all they could to console him—for such is ever the reward of kindness to our fellow-creatures.

One night as he was sitting disconsolate at home, thinking of poor Katrinchee, and wishing that either she was with him or he with her, he heard a distant uproar in the street, which seemed approaching nearer and nearer. He was about to rise and go to the door to see what was the occasion, when suddenly it was pushed open with some violence, and a man rushed past him with a little ceremony. He seemed in a great hurry, for he panted for breath, and it was some time before he could say,

"I beseech thee to shut the door and hide me, for my life is in danger."

Nicholas, who never refused to do a good-natured act, did as he was desired, so far as shutting and barring the door. He then asked—

"What hath endangered thy life, and who art thou, friend, that thou art thus afraid?"

"Ask me not now, I beseech thee, Nicholas—"

"Thou knowest my name then?" said the other, interrupting him.

"I do—everybody knows thee, and thy kindness of heart. But ask me nothing now—only hide me for the present, and when the danger is past I will tell thee all."

"Thou art no murderer or fugitive from justice?"

"No, on my faith. I am sinned against, but I never injured but one man, and I was sorry for that. But hark, I hear them coming—wilt thou or wilt thou not protect me?"

"I will," said the good Nicholas, who saw in the dignified air and open countenance of the stranger something that inspired both confidence and awe. Accordingly he hastily led him into a remote apartment where he secreted him in a closet, the door of which could not be distinguished, and in which he kept his money and valuables, for he said to himself, I will trust this man, he does not look as if he would abuse my confidence.

"Take this key and lock thyself in, that thou mayest be able to get out in case they take me away."

Presently there was heard a great hallooing and banging at the outward door, with a cry of "open! open!" and Nicholas went to the door and opened it. A flood of people rushed in helter-skelter, demanding the body of an arch heretic, who, they said, had been seen to take refuge in the house. But with all their rage and eagerness they begged his excuse for this unceremonious proceeding, for Nicholas was beloved and respected by all, though he was a heretic himself.

"He's here—we saw him enter!" they cried.

"If he is here, find him," quoth Nicholas quietly. "I will not say he is not here, neither would I betray him if he were."

The interlopers then proceeded to search all parts of the house, except the secret closet, which escaped their attention. When they had done this, one of them said,

"We have heard of thy having a secret place in thy house where thy money and papers are secured. Open it to us—we swear not to molest or take away aught that is thine."

The good Nicholas was confounded at this demand, and stood for a moment not knowing what to say or what to do. The stranger in the closet heard it too; but he was a stout-hearted man, and trusted in the Lord.

"Where is thy strong closet?" cried one of the fiercest and most forward of the intruders. "We must and will find it."

"Well, then find it," quoth Nicholas quietly.

They inspected the room narrowly, and knocked against the walls in hopes the hollow sound would betray the secret of the place. But they were disappointed, for the door was so thick that it returned no hollow sound.

They now began to be impatient, and savage withal, and the ferocious leader exclaimed—

"Let us take this fellow then. One heretic is as good as another—as bad I mean."

"Seize him!" cried one.

"Away with him!" cried another.

"To the stake!" cried a third.

They forgot the ancient kindnesses of the good man; for bigotry and over-heated zeal remember not benefits, and pay no respect to the obligations of gratitude. The good Nicholas was violently seized, his hands tied behind him, and he was about to be carried away a sacrifice to the demon of religious discord, when the door of the closet flew open, and the stranger came forth with a step so firm, a look so lofty and inspired, that the rabble quailed, and was silent before him.

"Unbind this man," said he, in a voice of authority, "and bind me in his stead."

Not a man stirred. They seemed spell-bound, and stood looking at each other in silent embarrassment.

"Unbind this man, I say!"

Still they remained, as it were, petrified with awe and astonishment.

"Well, then I shall do it myself," and he proceeded to release the good Nicholas from his bonds while the interlopers remained silent and motionless.

"Mistaken men!" then said he, looking at them with pity, mingled with indignation, "you believe yourselves fulfilling the duties of your faith when you chase those who differ from you about the world, as if they were wild beasts, and drag them to the stake, like malefactors who have committed the worst crimes against society. You think that the blood of human victims is the most acceptable offering to your Maker, and, worse than the ignorant pagans, who made martyrs of the blessed saints, sacrifice them on the altar of a religion which is all charity, meekness, and forgiveness. But I see you are ashamed of yourselves. Go, and do so no more."

The spirit of intolerance quailed before the majesty of truth and genius. The poor deluded men, whose passions had been stimulated by mistaken notions of religious duty, bowed their heads and departed, rebuked and ashamed.

"Who art thou?" asked Nicholas, when they were gone.

"Thou shalt soon know," replied the stranger. "In the mean time listen to me. I must be gone before the fiend, which I have, perhaps, only laid for a few moments, again awakens in the bosoms of these deluded men, or some others like them get on the scent of their prey, and track their victim hither. Listen to me, Nicholas, kind and good Nicholas. Thou wouldst have endangered thy own life for the safety of a stranger—one who had no claim on thee save that of hospitality—nay, not even that, for I was not thy guest by invitation, but intrusion. Blessed be thee and thine, thy house, thy memory when thou art dead, and thy lot hereafter. Thou art worthy to know who I am."

He then disclosed to him a name with which the world hath since rung, from clime to clime, from country to country. A name incorporated inseparably with the interests of truth and the progress of learning.

"Tell it not in Gath—proclaim it not in the streets of Ascalon," continued he, "for it is a name which carries with it the sentence of death in this yet benighted city. Interests of the deepest nature—interests vitally connected with the progress of truth—the temporal and eternal happiness of millions living, of millions yet unborn, brought me hither. The business I came upon is in part performed; but it is now known to some that I am, or have been in the city, who will never rest till they run me down and tear me in pieces. Farewell, and look for thy reward, if not here, hereafter—for, sure as thou livest and breathest, a good action, done with a pure and honest motive, is twice blessed—once to the doer and once to him to whom it is done."

The good Nicholas would have knelt to the mighty genius that stood before him, but he prevented him.

"I am no graven image, nor art thou an idolater that thou shouldst kneel to me. Farewell! Let me have thy prayers, for the prayers of a good man are indeed blessings."

Saying this, the illustrious stranger departed in haste, and Nicholas never saw him more for a long time. But he said to himself,

"Blessed is my house, for it hath sheltered the bright light of the universe."

From that time forward, he devoted himself to the good cause of the reformation with heart and soul. His house was ever the refuge of the persecuted; his purse the never-failing resource of the distressed; and many were the victims of bigotry and intolerance whom his influence and entreaties saved from the stake and the torture. He lived a blessing to all within the sphere of his influence, and was blessed in living to see the faith which he loved and cherished at length triumph over the efforts of power, the arts of intrigue, and the fire of bigotry.

Neither did he forget nor neglect the customary offices of kindness and good will to the little children of the city, who continued still to come and share his goodly cakes, which he gave with the smile and the open hand of kind and unaffected benignity. It must have been delightful to see the aged patriarch sitting at his door, while the little boys and girls gathered together from all parts to share his smiles, to be patted on the head, and kissed, and laden with his bounties.

Every new-year's day especially, being his birth-day, as it came round, was a festival, not only to all the children, but to all that chose to come and see him. It seemed that he grew younger instead of older on each return of the season; for he received every one with smiles, and even his enemies were welcome to his good cheer. He had not the heart to hate anybody on the day which he had consecrated to innocent gaiety, liberal hospitality, and universal benevolence. In process of time his example spread among the whole city, and from thence through the country, until every village and town, nay, every house, adopted the good custom of setting apart the first day of the year to be gay and happy, to exchange visits, and shake hands with friends and to forgive enemies.

Thus the good Nicholas lived, blessing all and blessed by all, until he arrived at a happy old age. When he had reached fourscore years, he was sitting by himself late in the evening of the first of January, old style, which is the only true and genuine era after all—the new style being a pestilent popish innovation—he was sitting, I say, alone, the visitors having all departed, laden with gifts and good wishes. A knock was heard at the door, which always opened of itself, like the heart of its owner, not only on new-year's day, but every day in the year.

A stately figure entered and sat down by him, after shaking his hand right heartily. The good Nicholas was now old, and his eye-sight had somewhat failed him, particularly at night.

"Thou art welcome," quoth the old man.

"I know it," replied the other, "every one is welcome to the house of the good Nicholas, not only on this, but every other day. I have heard of thee in my travels."

"Thou knowest my name—may I not know thine?"

The stranger whispered a name in his ear, which made the heart of the good Nicholas leap in his bosom.

"Dost thou remember the adventure of the closet?" said the stranger.

"Yea—blessed be the day and the hour," said the old man.

And now they had a long conversation, which pertained to high matters, not according with the nature of my story, and therefore I pass them by, more especially as I do not exactly know what they were.

"I almost fear to ask thee," at length said Nicholas, "but thou must partake of my cheer, on this the day of my birth. I shall not live to see another."

Old people are often prophetic on the duration of their lives.

"Assuredly," replied the other, "for it is neither beneath my character nor calling to share the good man's feast, and to be happy when I can."

So they sat down together and talked of old times, and how much better the new times were than the old, inasmuch as the truth had triumphed, and they could now enjoy their consciences in peace.

The illustrious visitor staid all night; and the next morning, as he was about to depart, the aged Nicholas said to him,

"Farewell—I shall never see thee again. Thou art going a long journey, thou sayest, but I am about venturing on one yet longer."

"Well, be it so," said the other. "But those who remain behind will bless thy name and thy memory. The little children will love thee, and so long as thy countrymen cherish their ancient customs, thou wilt not be forgotten."

They parted, and the prediction of the good Nicholas was fulfilled. He fell asleep in the arms of death, who called him so softly, and received him so gently in his embrace, that though his family knew he slept, they little thought it was forever.

When this news went abroad into the city, you might see the worthy burgomasters and citizens knocking the ashes out of their pipes, and putting them quietly by in their button-holes; and the good housewives, ever and anon lifting their clean white aprons to their eyes, that they might see to thread their needles or find the stitches, as they sat knitting their stockings. The shops and schools were all shut the day he was buried; but it was remarked that the men neglected their usual amusements, and the little children had no heart to play.

When the whole city had gathered together at the side of his grave, there suddenly appeared among them a remarkable and goodly-looking man, of most reverent demeanor. Every one bowed their bodies, in respectful devotion, for they knew the man, and what they owed him. All was silent as the grave, just about to receive the body of Nicholas, when he I have just spoken of lifted his head, and spoke as follows:

"The good man just about to enter the narrow house" never defrauded his neighbor, never shut his door on the stranger, never did an unkind action, nor ever refused a kind one either to friend or foe. His heart was all goodness, his faith all purity, his morals all blameless, yea, all praiseworthy. Such a man deserves the highest title that can be bestowed on man. Join me then, my friends, old and young—men, women, and children, in blessing his memory as the good saint Nicholas; for I know no better title to such a distinction than pure faith, inflexible integrity, and active benevolence." Thus spake the great reformer, John Calvin.

The whole assembled multitude, with one voice and one heart, cried out, "Long live the blessed memory of the good St. Nicholas!" as they piously consigned him to the bosom of his mother earth.

Thus did he come to be called St. Nicholas; and the people, not content with this, as it were by a mutual sympathy, and without coming to any understanding on the subject, have ever since set apart the birth-day of the good man, for the exercise of hospitality to men, and gifts to little children. From the old world they carried the custom to the new, where their posterity still hold it in reverence, and where I hope it will long continue to flourish, in spite of the cold heartless forms, unmeaning ceremonies, and upstart pretensions of certain vulgar people, who don't know any better, and therefore ought to be pitied for their ignorance, rather than condemned for their presumption. b.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Lives of the most eminent British Painters and Sculptors. By Allan Cunningham. 3 vols. pp. 305, 273, 315. Being the 17th, 18th, and 19th numbers of the Family Library. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

AMONG the publications of the past fortnight there is not one which has afforded us so much gratification as we have found in the three neat volumes bearing the title that is put forth in the caption (as the lawyers call it) of this article. In point of mere amusement, biographical writings must be admitted to rank only second to those which are purely fictitious; on the score of utility they are to be preferred—that is, when good. It requires no small talent, and that of a peculiar and not very common kind, to write a good biography. There must be taste and judgment to select, sagacity and penetration to investigate, impartiality to decide, and last not least, there must be skill in narration to adorn and charm, and practice in writing that the sin of tediousness may be avoided. All these requisites are possessed to a very satisfactory extent by Allan Cunningham, the author of the sketches (for they are but sketches) which we have just finished. His narrative is easy and unambitious, yet clear and appropriate to the subject. His greatest anxiety seems to have been to condense his matter, and in this he has succeeded to admiration, yet without appearing to have omitted anything that might be necessary to a just or at least vivid portraiture. We could read more with pleasure, though all, so far as we can perceive, is told.

Of all men, living or dead, the lives of artists as a body, afford the most interesting materials for biography. We read of them with a delight akin to that which is derived from their society. The causes of this fact are not difficult of discovery. Their profession brings them constantly into the best and the most diversified circles; their intercourse is with all classes and conditions of men; they become almost involuntarily acquainted with literature and the world, and have their faculties sharpened in the society of the witty and the learned. By nature they are observant, for the faculty of observation is one of those ingredients which combine to form what we call a genius for the art: the consequence is, that they are shrewd discriminators of character, and have always something pleasant to tell; some striking or characteristic reminiscence of each of those distinguished personages whose features they have immortalized, and whose traits of private character all men are so eager to catch. The grand or gorgeous imaginings of the poet are nursed in solitude and seclusion, and treasured up as they arise, till they can be matured and combined for the delight of posterity; it is the nature of the artist to produce his fresh from the mint: silent thought is the province of the former; the policy as well as the taste of the latter leads him to exhibit, even in the very act, the workings of his mind, and the process by which they are matured. In general they are men of ardent temperament, with little skill and less desire to conceal their ideas and their feelings. It is no wonder, then, that their biographies are in the highest degree amusing and instructive.

But there are yet other points in the general character of artists which assist in giving to their actions and conversations a peculiar charm, and to the history of their lives no small portion of its universal attraction. They, more than any other class of men, not even excepting the poets, inhabit a world of their own creation, of more than earthly splendor; imagination surrounds them with an atmosphere of light and living beauty; forms of surpassing loveliness, or of immortal majesty, such as are sought in vain amid the tame realities of life, are ever hovering near them, and are summoned at the will of genius to the presence of its privileged possessor; everything of fair and glorious and god-like, that the most glowing imagination can conceive, assumes for the eye of the painter a more perfect semblance of animated existence, than can be commanded by the wish or the will of other men; for him the cloud that shadows, not obscures, their glory, is withdrawn, and they stand before him in all the gorgeousness of their created magnificence, the majesty of intellect, the pomp of power, or the softer radiance of unsurpassable beauty. By this rare and glorious communion, his mind, his very nature becomes in a measure spiritualized and set apart, as it were, from those of his fellow-men; some few faint rays, at least, of the intellectual splendor in the light of which he lives, cannot but be reflected from his intellect; it would be difficult for him, even were it his will, to avoid imbibing some portion of the spirit which animates his conceptions and gilds his waking dreams: his character is tinged even unconsciously, with the hues his fancy loves to call into existence.

The moral attributes of the artist too are not without their distinguishing characteristics; with very few exceptions we see him indifferent to money, that great cynosure of worldly eyes; enthusiastic, industrious, and persevering in his labors, but not for gain alone; fame is his first idol, the advancement of his art the second: these are the objects of all his actions, the never-absent subjects of his thought, the real origin even of his words. Unskilled to subdue or disguise his sentiments, unconscious even of the sad necessity of doing so, he pours lavishly forth the wealth of his ideas, teeming with originality, and scatters about him praise or censure with the most unsuspecting candor. The great tidings of the world's doings are idle to him, except as affording a theme or materials for a picture; there is but one instrument in the world, and that is his pencil.

Of such materials it would almost be difficult to construct a dull book: Mr. Cunningham has done infinitely better; he has made one that is most interesting and worthy of the subject.

We should be pleased to offer some selections, but where all is so graphic and so entertaining it is difficult to extract. We have marked passage after passage, till the multitude of selections has become actually oppressive; and to avoid the difficulty of a choice, which must necessarily be limited, we can only advise all those of our readers who have any respect for our recommendation, to read the three volumes from beginning to end. We are confident of the thanks of such as shall be induced by our advice to procure for themselves so great an enjoyment.

Notes on Italy. By Rembrandt Peale. Written during a tour in the years 1829 and 1830. Philadelphia. Carey & Lea. 8vo. p. 328. 1831.

We confidently solicit for this volume the attention of our readers. Among numerous well written sketches of Rome, Florence, and Naples, accounts of Herculaneum and Pompeii, and brief observations upon London and Paris, it contains nothing to mar its general interest. It is difficult to find fault, because the author has undertaken nothing which he was not fully competent to accomplish. He describes, in clear and unaffected language, the impressions made upon him by the scenes, both of nature and art, of the celebrated places through which he passed, and without bewildering himself in the regions of either political or religious speculation. The reader is borne rapidly along, and enabled to take a brief survey of the most important objects which both instruct and amuse, without fatiguing his understanding. Indeed it is precisely the work one might anticipate from an intelligent painter, in whose journal, as in his portfolio, we would naturally look for sketches, at once accurate and picturesque. We are strongly tempted to subjoin a few specimens of his pleasant and terse narratives, but must postpone them until some future period. At present we can only afford space for the following observations on the decease of one of our fellow-citizens:

"A sad occasion for the assemblage of the few Americans who were in Rome, occurred to cloud the cheerfulness of spring by the death of Mr. Hone, of New-York. It is not easy to express the loss thus sustained by his relations and friends, nor to say how much the fine arts have suffered by the early death of one whose taste, zeal, and liberality were so favorable to their cultivation in America. He was interred in the ground allotted for strangers, close to the Pyramid or tomb of Caius Cestus. A number of curious Italians followed the unusual procession of carriages, to witness the solemn ceremony as performed by an English episcopal clergyman; during which they respectfully remained uncovered. I could not repress a most melancholy feeling on finding myself in the midst of so many tombs, bearing inscriptions in all the languages of Europe, over the remains of many amiable and distinguished persons, who had died so far from their homes."

As a painter, Mr. Peale ranks high among American artists, and is now in Philadelphia, exhibiting his copies of the Italian master-pieces.

The Cabinet of History. Conducted by the Rev. Dionysius Lardner. Assisted by eminent literary men. Outlines of History. Philadelphia. Carey and Lea. 12mo. p. 327. 1831.

This useful work has already run through one American edition. It comprehends a brief epitome of the world from the earliest ages until the pacification in 1815. While an attentive perusal of it would prove highly instructive to the young student, more matured scholars will find it valuable as a book of reference.

Annals of the Family of M'Roy. By Mrs. Blackford. New-York. William Burgess. 12mo. pp. 243, 214. 1831.

This tale is something in the style of Mrs. Opie's writings, wherein a useful moral is attempted to be illustrated by conducting the heroine through the various scenes of domestic and fashionable life. From a cursory perusal, we were pleased with the simplicity of the language and the excellent tendency of the plot. Female beauty, however brilliant, is so much more enchanting when unaccompanied by vanity and affectation, that we advise young ladies, inclined to think rather too highly of their personal charms, to read the volumes and be instructed.

The Catechism of Health: or plain and simple rules for the preservation of the health and vigor of the constitution from infancy to old age. Philadelphia. Journal of Health press. 18mo. p. 195. 1831.

In this little volume will be found much sensible information; but we object to the catechetical system of communicating knowledge to grown persons. It may be pursued with young children, but the general reader grows fatigued with the monotony of continual interrogation. By a different arrangement also the book might have been condensed into half its present size, an advantage, in this age of teeming presses, by no means to be disregarded.

Our correspondent appears to have imbibed a strong predilection for the "imperial seion," whose situation at present does, in truth, render him a fine subject for poetry. It would, however, be needless to observe, that we publish these verses without any reference to their political bearing.—Eps.

TO PARIS.

Oh, Paris! thou beautiful city!
Thy glory and beauty are o'er!
The stranger but names thee to pity,
Who once could but name to adore.
Oh! how can thy spirit be quiet,
While thou must remember the day,
When swine in thy palace run riot,
And the lion stalked sternerly away!
And whom hast thou now to control thee?
The timid and politic fox!
And what has he done but cajole thee,
And dandle thy eagles to cocks!
No wonder that emblem must please him,
It puts him in mind of his prey;
But he fear'd that the eagle would seize him,
And shake his vile carcass away!
Oh yet shall the whelp of the lion
In the might of his father arise,
And yet the imperial seion
Its branches shall toss to the skies!
Thine idol shall rival the story
That haunts Napoleon's urn;
Then, Paris, thy beauty and glory
In triumph again shall return!

A SPRING EVENING.

FROM THE GERMAN OF MATTHISON.

Bright with the changing colors of the skies
The many dew-drops gleam,
The image of the varied landscape lies
Clear on the silent stream.
Bright as the crystal spring, the blossoming tree,
The meadow tinged with gold;
The star of evening, peeping timidly
From the cloud's purple fold.
The valley's green is beautiful, the heath
And flowery-mantled hill;
The little lake girt with its sedgy wreath,
And alder-shaded rill!
O! how the influence of eternal love
Circles life like a band!
The glow-worm, and the star that shines above,
Each shows a Father hand.
It is thy power that bids the bud uprear
Its beauty to the day,
That bids the burning planet disappear
From its unnumbered way!

REMARKS ON THE
CHARACTER, CONDUCT, SITUATION, AND PROSPECTS*Of those who live by the labor of their hands.*

BY M. CAREY.

LET us now turn to the appalling case of seamstresses employed on coarse work, and to that of spoolers, and here "I will a tale unfold" "to harrow up the soul" of all those endowed with feelings of humanity.

Coarse shirts and duck pantaloons are frequently made for eight and ten cents. The highest rate in the United States, with two most honorable exceptions, which I shall notice presently, is twelve and a half cents. Women free from the incumbrance of children, in perfect health, and with constant uninterrupted employment, cannot, by the testimony of ladies of the first respectability, who have fully scrutinized the affair, make more than nine shirts per week, working from twelve to fifteen hours per day, and possessing considerable expertness.* Those incumbered with children, or in indifferent health, or inexpert, cannot make more than six or seven. They are, moreover, as I have already stated, very partially employed. But laying aside all the various disadvantages and drawbacks, and placing the circumstances in the most favorable point of light, let us consider the case of a woman in perfect health, without children, and with uninterrupted employment—and see the result of her painful labors, and how little attention is paid to the awful denunciation against those that "grind the faces of the poor."

"The subscribers having perused with attention and deep interest the following statement, signed by thirty ladies of respectability, intelligence, and competence to decide on the subject, respectfully submit it to the consideration of their fellow-citizens:

"The undersigned having seriously considered the case of those seamstresses who work in their own lodgings, and whose dependence is on their needles, are convinced that the prices they receive for their work are inadequate for their support; that expert seamstresses, if fully employed, and unincumbered with children, cannot make more, working early and late, than eight or nine shirts, or duck pantaloons, per week; that the highest price paid here for those articles is twelve and a half cents each; which only amounts to one dollar twelve and a half cents per week; that the women in question almost universally pay fifty cents a week for their lodgings, which leaves but sixty-two and a half cents per week, or nine cents per day, for meat, drink, clothing, fuel, &c. for an expert woman, constantly employed, and without children! that cases very frequently occur, of the above articles being made for ten, and even for eight, and sometimes for six cents; that these women are frequently unemployed; that many of them are widows, who formerly lived in affluence; that no small number are aged and infirm, and unfit for any other occupation; that the occasional want of employment and sickness make a serious drawback on their slender means of support; that many of them, but for the assistance they receive from charitable individuals and benevolent societies, would not only be unable to pay their rent, but be often sorely distressed for the common necessities of life! Taking the whole of these afflicting circumstances under consideration, they strongly recommend their case to the consideration of the public at large, but more particularly to that of those by whom they are employed, in the hope that some alleviation of the sufferings of this numerous class may be devised and effected.

"Various other species of female labor are equally ill paid, particularly those of spoolers and winders of thread; but they have not judged it necessary to go into more particulars."

Philadelphia, May 24th, 1830.

The ladies names are omitted from motives of delicacy.

It is impossible to peruse this statement without extreme regret and surprise that such a state of things should have existed in this flourishing city, wholly unknown, as it must have been, to the mass of our citizens. That the case of the unfortunate women referred to calls loudly for a remedy, so far as may be practicable, cannot for a moment be doubted. That a complete and radical remedy is practicable we do not flatter ourselves, while the demand for employment so far exceeds the demand for that species of labor. And we regret to say, that there are cases in which the competition among the sellers of the articles produced by those women may have so far reduced their prices, as to render it impossible for the employers to raise the wages, without injustice to themselves. Yet we fondly hope there are very many cases in which the employers may be able to reconcile more liberal wages with a due regard for their own interest. And when the extent and intensity of the suffering that must inevitably arise from the present low rate of wages are duly considered, we rely that every man of generous and liberal feeling, who can afford to raise the compensation for the labors of those women, will cheerfully obey the dictates of humanity and justice.

Such is the hideous, the deplorable state of a numerous and interesting portion of the population of our cities in the most prosperous country in the world! And be it noted, to the discredit of the wealthy portion of the nation, of both sexes, particularly the ladies, that this subject has for three years been pressed on the public attention, in almost every shape and form, without exciting a single efficient effort in Boston, New-York, or Philadelphia—I will not say, to remedy or alleviate this horrible state of things—but even to inquire into it, and ascertain whether it was or was not remediless. It is impossible to regard this apathy without astonishment and indignation.

I have not lightly thrown a higher degree of censure on the ladies in this case than on the gentlemen. It was peculiarly the cause of the former. Their sex are "ground to the earth," and it was the peculiar duty and province of the ladies to stand forth in their defence. In such a holy cause of humanity their efforts could not have failed of success. They might readily have stimulated their fathers, brothers, husbands, and cousins, to meet and devise some plan to mitigate sufferings which drive numbers of unfortunate women to DESTRUCTION—to ruin here, and perhaps hereafter. Half the zeal, the effort that they make in other causes, not calling so loudly for their interference, would have sufficed to render the defence of those oppressed women fashionable. But they have looked on with calm indifference. I have applied in Philadelphia and New-York personally, or by letter, to above fifty ladies in each city—and every one of them expressed deep sympathy for the sufferers, but the sympathy was barren and unproductive.

In speaking of the effect on some of those unfortunate women to drive them to licentious courses, I ought to use the strongest language the subject would admit of, in order to make a deep impression on the reader, somewhat commensurate with the magnitude of the evil, and the enormity of the oppression under which they groan. A due consideration of their actual situation, and the gloomy prospects before them, would lead to anticipate such a result. Beseet on the one side by poverty and wretchedness—with scanty and poor fare, miserable lodgings, clothing inferior in quality and often inadequate in quantity; without the most distant hope of a melioration of condition, by a course of honest and unremitting industry—and on the other side, the allurements of present enjoyments; comfortable apartments, fine dress, with a round of pleasures; all these held out by vice and crime to entice them from the paths of virtue, is it wonderful that many of them fall victims, and enter on the "broad path that leads to destruction?" Is not the trial almost too severe for poor human nature? Let those who pass a heavy censure on them, and are ready exultingly to cry out, with the pharisee in the gospel, "thank God, we are not like one of these," ponder well what might have been their conduct in similar circumstances.

But that this is too often the result, does not depend on an elaborate process of reasoning, which, notwithstanding its plausibility, might lead to erroneous conclusions. We have the evidence of various citizens, whose opportunities duly qualify them to decide the question by the infallible test of facts.*

* Extract of a letter from Dr. Van Rensselaer, of New-York.

"My profession affords me many and unpleasant opportunities of knowing the wants of those unfortunate females, who try to earn an honest subsistence by the needle, and to witness the struggles often made by honest pride and destitution. I could cite many instances of young, and even middle-aged women, who have been 'lost to virtue,' apparently by no other cause than the lowness of wages, and the absolute impossibility of procuring the necessities of life by honest industry."

New-York, 5th April, 1830.

"MY DEAR SIR—The subject of conversation at our last interview is one of great importance in every well-regulated community, and cannot fail to interest every benevolent mind. I mean the inadequate price usually paid for female labor, particularly to poor widows who are burthened with small children. It is a subject which ought to arouse the feelings of every philanthropist; for I have no hesitation in saying, from my own observation, as one of the acting magistrates of this city, that no inconsiderable portion of female distress and female depravity is to be attributed to the very scanty remuneration they receive for honest industry. I hope, therefore, most sincerely, that your unceasing efforts in the cause you have so disinterestedly espoused will be crowned with ultimate success. Yours, sincerely,

JOHN W. WYMAN.

Extract of a letter from the Rev. Ezra Stiles Ely, D.D.

"From intimate acquaintance with many of the industrious poor for eighteen years past, both in New-York and in this city, I am constrained to say, that your remarks concerning the inadequate payment which females receive for their labor are just, and ought

But we are gravely told that these women ought to go to service—that servants are scarce; if they would condescend to fill that station they might have comfortable homes, abundance of good food, light labor, and high wages, so as to enable them to dress handsomely.

On the subject of servants I wish to offer a few observations, which, I am well aware, will be unpopular, and of course condemned by many; but fully convinced as I am of their truth and justice, I risk that consequence. No man is fit to write for the public who can be deterred from a free and bold expression of his sentiments, because they are likely to be unpalatable.

That there are as many servants as there are places for them, I am persuaded; and if the two classes of seamstresses and spoolers were at once converted into servants, there would be as great a redundancy of this class as there is now of the others. I do not deny that there are bad servants, and many of them. But are there not harsh and unreasonable masters and mistresses? Surely it would be miraculous if the twenty-eight thousand housekeepers in the city of Philadelphia, were all immaculate, and treated their servants with propriety. Those that are harsh, difficult to please, and use their servants ill, are as well known among that class as a dishonest merchant or trader is known on 'change. Such persons can rarely procure good servants. These know their own value, are high-minded, and will not go to places where they are likely to meet with harsh or improper treatment. Of course masters or mistresses of this description are often without servants, and when they do procure them, they are constantly changing, constantly complaining, and bringing discredit, as far as their testimony goes, on the whole class. Fifty persons of this description will do more to disparage the character of servants than one thousand who have good ones can do to defend them. The latter never make their servants a topic for the entertainment of their company. They are satisfied to enjoy the advantages without proclaiming them. Whereas those who are annoyed by bad servants, make their sufferings a constant subject of conversation; and there are persons who, slenderly endowed with the conversational powers, find this an unending and inexhaustible topic.*

But be this as it may, I would observe that among the class of persons depending on sewing and spooling there is a large proportion of aged widows, who are wholly unfit for service, and there are among them many young widows, with two or three small children, who are as dear to them as theirs are to the rich—whom, of course, they cannot bear to part with—and whom their wages, as servants, would not enable them to support at nurse.

The pernicious consequences of the inadequate wages paid the women of the classes I have in question, is strikingly displayed by the state of the out-door paupers in the city of Philadelphia. Of four hundred and ninety-eight females there are

Seamstresses—	142	Spoolers—	28
Washerwomen—	62	Shoe-binders—	10

—242

Being nearly one-half of the whole number. There are four hundred and six widows.

It may excite wonder how the seamstresses, spoolers, &c. are able to support human nature, as their rent absorbs above two-fifths of their miserable earnings. The fact is, they generally contrive to raise their rent by begging from benevolent citizens, and of course their paltry earnings go to furnish food and clothing.

I stated that there are two honorable exceptions to the low rate of wages paid to seamstresses. They are entitled to a high degree of applause, and are worthy examples, which ought to be generally followed. The one is the "Female deeply to affect every benevolent person, who has any wish to do justly, and see honest industry suitably rewarded. A common slave, in the states of Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, is much better compensated for his labor, by his necessary food, clothing, lodging, and medicines, than many respectable mothers and daughters in this city, who apply themselves diligently to their work two hours for every one occupied by the negro in his master's service. Your remarks will apply to the folding and stitching of books, to the sewing of carpet rags, to the binding of shoes, no less than to the work done for the army and navy."

* I well know I am treading upon delicate ground, but I meet the consequences unhesitatingly. Masters and mistresses are too apt to expect perfection in their servants, and to make no allowance for small faults, never taking into consideration their own imperfections. This is the source of three-fourths of all the discomforts that arise in the intercourse between masters and servants. All trivial errors, and indeed all errors resulting from inadvertence, ought to be overlooked, or very gently rebuked. This is a plain, simple rule, the observance of which would prevent most of those changes, which are among the chief causes of the complaints of bad servants. How often does it happen that a trivial fault, resulting from a pardonable inadvertence, which ought to be overlooked, produces a serious quarrel, which occasions the loss of a faithful servant, who has been in the family for years! A sharp and rough rebuke produces a part and hasty reply—warning is given on one side or the other; and both parties, when too late, regret the petulance and peevishness which led to the separation, equally disadvantageous and uncomfortable to both.

Hospitable Society of Philadelphia," the other the "Impartial Humane Society of Baltimore." The former has uniformly paid eighteen and three-quarter cents for making shirts and duck pantaloons, and in the same proportion for other articles. The scale of prices of the latter is as follows:

Fine linen shirts.....	87½ cents
Fine muslin shirts.....	50
Common muslin shirts.....	25
Unbleached muslin shirts.....	18½
Fine waistcoats.....	62½
Second quality waistcoats.....	50
Common waistcoats.....	37½
Fine pantaloons.....	75
Second quality.....	50
Common quality.....	37½
Drawers.....	18½
Roundabouts.....	62½

It is deeply to be regretted that in such a wealthy and public-spirited city as Baltimore, this institution has but three hundred subscribers, although the subscription is but one dollar per annum—whereas for so glorious an object as rescuing such numbers of interesting females from penury and distress and all their demoralizing consequences, had the annual subscription been five dollars, there ought to have been one thousand subscribers.

The ladies who conduct the business of the society complain that the printers of newspapers, with one or two exceptions, do not afford them that powerful aid which the press owes to all useful establishments—and few are more pre-eminently useful than this association.

The case of the spoolers is at least as hard, and their sufferings as great as those of the seamstresses. By no degree of industry and skill can they earn in summer more than a dollar and a quarter, or a dollar in winter—and during the latter season they are, for the most part, employed but half their time.

IV. The fourth position which I undertook to controvert is, that "Taxes for the support of the poor, and aid afforded them by benevolent societies, are pernicious; as, by encouraging the poor to depend on them, they foster their idleness and improvidence, and thus produce, or at least increase the poverty and distress they are intended to relieve."

If I have proved, as I hope I have satisfactorily, that there are classes of people, male and female, whose dependence is on their hands for support, whose wages, when fully employed, are not more than sufficient for that purpose; that when unemployed they must be reduced to penury and want; and that there are classes of females whose wages are inadequate, even when regularly and constantly employed; it follows, of course, that the poor rates and the aid of benevolent societies, far from producing the pernicious effects ascribed to them, are imperiously necessary, and that without them numbers would actually perish of want, as I have stated, or would have recourse to mendicancy, and mendicants impose a far heavier tax on a community than the same number of paupers supported by poor rates. The support of the five hundred and forty nine out-door paupers of Philadelphia, averages forty-six and a quarter cents a week—or less than seven cents per day. Some of them receive only a quarter of a dollar a week. I submit a statement of the whole number:

42 at 25 cents; 2 at 31; 186 at 37½; 259 at 50; 17 at 62½; 42 at 75; 1 at 100—Total 549.

If these were strolling mendicants, as, by the abrogation of the poor laws and the annihilation of benevolent societies, they would become, instead of an average of seven cents per day, the average would more probably be twenty-five or thirty cents, thus increasing the burthen on the community three or four fold. Many of them, with a wo-begone appearance, calculated to excite sympathy, whether real or fictitious, would probably realize fifty cents, and often a dollar a day.

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

HERNANI.

OUR readers have heard of this celebrated tragedy, by Victor Hugo, which occasioned such a stir among the theatre-going people of Paris, and so much excitement between the schools of the Classicists and Romanticists. It has recently been translated into English, and brought out at one of the royal theatres in London, with what success we have not yet learned. It is founded upon Spanish incidents, and of course illustrative of Spanish manners and character. We have no idea of entering into an analysis of the plot of this play, for two reasons; one of which is, that such analyses are usually very stupid; and another, that it has already been done at length in a late number of the Foreign Quarterly Review. The scene which we have translated below is one of the best, and may be thus very briefly explained. We shall talk something like a prompter's copy, when we say—time, midnight; Donna Sol at her balcony, expecting the coming of her lover Hernani; and Don Carlos the king, who had overheard the appointment, in waiting to arrest Hernani, and carry away his mistress: Donna Sol, having heard the signal agreed upon, descends from the balcony, and finds herself in the grasp of Don Carlos.

Donna Sol. O! It is not his voice, and I am lost!
Don Car. What sweeter accents would you listen to Than to a lover's accents, and a king's!
Donna Sol. The king!
Don Car. I throw a kingdom at your feet!
Behold from whose embrace you would escape,
At once your sovereign master—and your slave!
Donna Sol. Help! Help! Hernani!
Don Car. Proper and worthy fear!
It is the king who clasps thee, and not thy bandit.

Donna Sol. Is there no shame in man and royalty?
I blush for your disgraced nobility.
Is this a triumph that a king should boast of,
To overcome by force a poor weak woman?
Hernani then is worth an hundred kings.
Don Carlos, if the soul might mark the man,
And honor stamped the bandit and the king,
Then thou wouldst wield the sword and he the sceptre.
Don Car. Madam!
Donna Sol. Forget'st thou that my father was a count?
Don Car. I will make thee a duchess.
Donna Sol. Go! 'Tis shameful.
My father in your cause has shed his blood,
And I am jealous of my father's honor;
Too proud to be a monarch's favorite,
Too poor and humble to adorn his throne!
Don Car. Share then my name, my honors, and my throne!
You shall be queen and empress.

Donna Sol. No!
I am above such snares. I tell thee, king,
If I must tell thee, I had rather far,
With my Hernani lead the exile's life,
Outlawed and banished from the crowded world,
Enduring hunger, thirst, and wretchedness,
Sharing his destinies in bitter woe,
Deserted, doomed to want and misery,
Than sit an empress on a monarch's throne!
Don Car. How happy is this man!
Donna Sol. Proscribed and poor!
Don Car. Poor and proscribed perhaps, but he is loved.
I am alone, an angel follows him.
Thou hast me, then?
Donna Sol. I do not love thee.

Don Car. Well, and what matters it?
Donna Sol. O heavens, my lord!
You are a king: duchess or marchioness,
Or countess, you have only to select;
The ladies of the court have always love
To barter for thy love. Proscribed and exiled—
What has Hernani, then, received from heaven?
You have Castile, Navarre, and Arragon,
Murcie and Leon, twenty other kingdoms,
And India, with its boundless mines of gold!
You have an empire that no king can equal,
So vast the broad sun never sets upon it!
And with all this will you, would you, my king,
Tear me from him whose all is my affection?
Don Car. Come, come, I will not listen to you. Love,
I will divide my empire with you. Say
What kingdom you will choose?
Donna Sol. (Struggling in his arms.) For mine honor,
I only ask of you, my lord, this dagger.

(Snatching at the poinard in his girdle. He disengages himself from her, and steps back.)

Don Car. The beauty!
I no more wonder that she loves a rebel. (Advancing.)
Donna Sol. One step you perish, and I—
(He recoils—she turns and cries.)

Hernani!
Don Car. Be hushed.
Donna Sol. (Raising her dagger.) One step, and all is finished.
Don Car. If all my kindness ends in this, my lady,
I have with me three officers of my suite—
(Hernani suddenly rises behind him.)

Hernani. You have forgotten one of them.
(The king turns, and sees Hernani standing fixedly behind him in the shade, his arms folded under the long cloak which envelops him. Donna Sol utters a loud cry, runs towards him, and clasps him in her arms.)

Heaven is my witness,
How gladly I had met thee elsewhere.
Donna Sol. Hernani, save me from him.
Hernani. Be composed.
Don Car. Monterey! What, then, are my friends about,
To suffer this Bohemian prince to pass?
Monterey!
Hernani. Your friends are in my keeping;
So do not clamor for their powerless swords.
For three to do your bidding I have sixty.
Sixty, of whom one is worth four of yours.
Here, then, we will arrange our difference.
What! Lay a finger on a noble maiden!
It was unworthy of a king of Spain,
A cowardly and miserable act!

Don Car. What, my lord ruffian, are you teaching me?
(Smiling disdainfully.)

Hernani. He scoffs at me! Indeed I am not king,
But when a king insults and injures me
Vengeance alone can soothe my wounded honor.
Beware! A monarch's crest may wear less terror
Than the just wrath burning upon my brow.
You are a fool—if still deceived by hope. (Seizing him by the knee)
Know'st thou whose hand thus holds thee in its grasp? (Arm.)
Hearken a word—your father murdered mine—
I hate you. You have taken from me all
My honors and possessions—I despise you.
You would deprive me of my love—I curse you.
Ay, from my soul I hate, despise, and curse you!

Don Car. Sir!
Hernani. This night, however, all my hate is fled!
All that I sought I find.
Don Carlos, in your own toils you are taken;
There is no hope of flight or timely succour.
You are my prisoner. Enemies surround you.
You are alone. What will you do, my lord?
Don Car. Away!
Hernani. Go, go! You fall by no unworthy blow.
My vengeance asks a fitting sacrifice—
My arm shall do the deed. Defend yourself! (Draws his sword.)
Don Car. I am your master and your sovereign.
Strike!

Hernani. My lord, remember, yesterday your sword
Was crossed by mine.

Don Car. And yesterday we met upon a level—
Your rank unknown to me and mine to you.
To-day, my friend, we are no longer equal;
You know my dignity, and I know you.
Hernani. Perhaps!
Don Car. You may assassinate—I cannot fight with you.
Hernani. Think you that we shall stand upon such trifles?
Defend yourself.

Don Car. You may assassinate.
What, think you, ruffian, that your desperate hordes
Shall safely spread themselves over my cities?
That you, a robber and a murderer,
Shall put the noble on and play the hero?
That I will deign to honor your vile dagger,
By crossing its foul steel with my bright blade?
No! crime has stained you, and his crimson blots
Have steeped your garments. Hence! Away!
(Hernani, sombre and pensive, plays some minutes with the point of his sword, then turns quickly towards the king, and breaks the blade upon the pavement.)

Hernani. Go, then!
(The king turns towards him with a look of disdain.)

Go! we shall find more fit occasion!
Donna Sol. My Hernani!

Don Car. It is well.
In a few hours and I, the king, am safe
Within my ducal palace. My first care
Shall be to look into my treasury.
Has a price yet been put upon your head?
Hernani. There has.
Don Car. From this hour I consider you a traitor
And rebel, and I give fair warning of it.
The ban of the kingdom is upon your head.

Hernani. I am already exiled.
Don Car. Well!
Hernani. But France is next to Spain, and there are ports
For entrance to her soil.

Don Car. I shall be emperor of Germany,
And banish you beyond the empire's limits.

Hernani. At your pleasure.
Still remain lands beyond your feeble sway;
From them I will defy you. There is refuge
Where thy hand cannot reach me.

Don Car. And when I shall have won the world?
Hernani. I still shall have the grave!

Don Car. Your insolent plot shall be discomfited.
Hernani. Vengeance is tardy, slow of pace; in time
She is sure to come!

Don Car. To lay her fingers on this royal dame
Who loves a bandit.

Hernani. Think'st thou I hold thee still?
Forget not, future emperor and Cesar,
I hold thee weak and helpless, in my power;
And with one grasp of my too loyal hand,
Can crush the imperial eagle in his shell.

Don Car. Do it.
Hernani. Go, go—away!

(Takes off his cloak, and throws it over the shoulders of the king.)

Away! and take this mantle,
Or in our ranks I fear some harm to thee.
I seek some fitter opportunity
For vengeance.

Don Car. And words like these, spoken by such as thou,
Shall surely meet the punishment they merit.

(King retires.)

LETTERS FROM BOSTON.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

Boston, May 1831.

I BELIEVE I never told you that my correspondence should touch upon anything but Boston, and if so, you may skip this letter as not being mentioned in the bond. But if you are, notwithstanding, disposed to continue friends, and go along with me, I will endeavor to be as instructive and entertaining as possible. I wish to carry you to Cambridge, and if you are not too particular in the mode of conveyance, step with me into the hourly accommodation, which is running from six in the morning to six or eight at night, between the metropolis and this old seat of learning. Suppose then we have rattled over a long bridge, passed through a mile of the most disgusting and abominable piece of town on earth—to wit, Cambridgeport—and having suffered from all the vile sights, sounds, and odors which can possibly assail the senses, you will be rolled along to quite a decent and reputable spot, which is the seat of Harvard University.

This institution, as you well know, is the oldest in the country. In the year 1636, the general court of Massachusetts appropriated four hundred pounds to the establishment of a college at Newtown. In 1638 the Rev. John Harvard, who had received the degree of A. M., at Emanuel college, in England, bequeathed seven hundred and seventy-nine pounds and twopence towards establishing a college, and in honor of him the institution, which had the benefit of his legacy, adopted his name. In 1640, Mr. Henry Dunster was chosen the first president: an officer whose duty at that time was "to inspect the manners of the students, and unto his morning and evening prayers to join some exposition of the chapters which they read from Hebrew into Greek from the Old Testament in the morning, and out of English into Greek from the New Testament in the evening."

The different schools connected at present with the university, are a medical school in this city, the theological school, which is an unitarian establishment, within a few hundred yards of the principal college enclosures, and the law school, which has been recently revived and gone into very successful ful operation, under the superintendence of Messrs. Story and Ashmun.

The various edifices which are occupied by the University, are Stoughton hall, Massachusetts hall, Holden chapel, Harvard hall, Holworthy hall, and University hall. These buildings, with the exception of the last, are of brick. University hall was built in 1814 of Chelmsford granite, and contains a chapel, recitation and lecture rooms, four large dining halls, with kitchens, baths, and probably a dozen et ceteras. These edifices stand on an inclosed plain of some dozen acres, ornamented and surrounded by shrubs and forest trees.

The library of the University consists of about thirty thousand volumes, which are deposited in two spacious rooms in Harvard hall. Large additions to it are annually making. Many of these works are exceedingly rare, and some of them, probably, are single copies; and if not, we shall risk little in saying that a number of them ought to be, as for any good they will ever do. These volumes have been accumulated principally within the last fifty years by liberal donations from a great variety of sources. Some of the donors have their names preserved and handed down by signs stuck up in the alcoves, a species of embalming, which, though not exactly like being laid up in lavender, is still a very respectable sort of perpetuation. One of the most distinguished of these was Mr. Hollis, on whose books we have noticed a number of queer devices, in relation to which we have copied the following paragraph from an old magazine.

"Mr. Hollis employed Mr. Pingo to cut a number of emblematical devices, such as the caduceus of Mercury, the wand of Æsculapius, the owl, the cap of liberty, &c.; and these devices were to adorn the backs, and sometimes the sides of books. When patriotism animated a work, instead of unmeaning ornaments on the binding, he adorned it with caps of liberty. When wisdom filled the page, the owl's majestic gravity bespoke its contents. The caduceus pointed out the works of eloquence, and the wand of Æsculapius was a sign of good medicine. The different emblems were used on the same book when possessed of different merits, and to express his disapprobation of the whole or parts of any work, the figure or figures were reversed. Thus each cover exhibited a critique on the book, and was a proof that they were not kept for show, as he must read before he could judge. Mark this, ye admirers of gilded books, and imitate."

But what do the fair and fashionable readers of your journal care about all this? In my next, to make amends for the dustiness of my present researches, and as an apology for their stupidity, I will tell you a little something about the various gentlemen connected with the University who have done anything to distinguish themselves from the general run of humanity. For personality is always interesting, even when it does not degenerate into scandal. P. G.

THE FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

SEVERAL subsequent visits to this fine collection of pictures, exhibited at Clinton-hall, have discovered to us so much worthy of praise, but overlooked in our first cursory glance, that we take pleasure in recurring to the subject. Indeed only a very lengthened and careful survey enables one to judge accurately of so many productions, and to enter properly into their individual merits. For a time the mind is too much divided by a multiplicity of impressions to compare and reason justly, and a glaring picture sometimes monopolizes the attention, while a thousand quiet displays of taste and genius escape the notice.

No. 8. General Lafayette, full-length. Mr. Morse. Nearly every body caught a glimpse of the veteran soldier during his visit to the United States. They will recognize the strong resemblance in this representation. He stands by two pedestals supporting busts of Franklin and Washington, while his right hand rests upon another unoccupied. Long may it be, before death unites him to his immortal associates. It is to be regretted, however, that the painting is not worthy the reputation of the president of the academy.

11. Full-length portrait of a lady. Another brilliant specimen by Ingham, and bearing the impress of his style. The folds of the dress are reality itself.

15. Morning scene. K. Hoyle. We do not wonder that artists are never weary of painting morning, yet it requires the devotion of a life to picture the sky. The clouds are too frequently dense and bold. Nature has made them all ethereal softness, floating, airy, and full of light. In the difficult delineation of this, the artist has approached near the reality, and afforded an agreeable contrast with his moonlight view. They should be together.

17 and 18. Marine views. Thompson. In one the water rough, the sails swollen, and boats scudding before the wind; the other calm, water spread out into a mirror—both very well done.

21. Landscape. Ward. All wanderers through the country have paused to admire just such scenes, and will appreciate the excellence of this production.

22. Family groupe, Italian costume. Weir. A mother bending pensively over her sleeping infant, and a little girl by her side. Valuable both as an illustration of the female attitude in that part of the world, and for the picturesque beauty of the groupe. One of Mr. Weir's strongest claims to praise is, that he completes his pictures. His figures are fresh with an almost living beauty, his landscapes touched with extreme care and delicacy; and in the present specimen the furniture of the apartment, particularly the cradle, is portrayed with great force and truth.

30. Portrait of a gentleman. Inman. A first-rate painting, and an uncommonly striking likeness.

31. The White Plume again. Gentlemen who have accounts to cast up, persons with a reputation for business-habits, youths addicted to sonnets, we recommend to keep clear of this face. The eyes are dangerous. We envy the ex-secretary on the opposite side of the room, who, from one week's end to another, does nothing but look at them. If he had such a countenance before him when he penned the late lucid communication to a distinguished individual, the obscurities which have puzzled the nation are satisfactorily accounted for.

34, 35, 129, 132. Portraits of Ladies. Ingham. "Talk'st thou of nothing but of ladies." This gentleman seems to possess the same perception of the human face, as it is displayed in a certain pleasing class of our fellow-creatures, that breathes in Weir's delineations of natural scenery or moral beauty. The latter spreads before the awakened fancy the heavens glowing with the radiance of the setting sun, a Greek expiring in the arms of his friend in the cause of freedom, knights doing battle in bright moonlight, winding rivers, luxuriant meadows, or verdant hills; the former leaves the hills and rivers to exhibit their own charms, and gives you faces—sweet, glowing, beautiful female faces. All his various conceptions are charming, and full of the earnestness of a fervid imagination.

54. Peter and John curing the lame. Weir. Although small, this deserves a careful study. The idea of distance is happily given, and the light falling softly on the street in the back ground, is not surpassed by any picture in the academy.

57. Rialto of Venice, moonlight. A. Richardson. There is much to be admired in this production.

58. Letter of Introduction. J. Dorn. The awkwardness of a youth, who seems afflicted with the uncommon misfortune of being modest, is here neatly illustrated. The bearer endures the broad glance of the company around the table, while the host peruses the letter. It is a very natural groupe, and well executed.

64, 71. Design and front view for the Record-office. If the dark and gloomy structure, which has, for so many years, answered the purpose of a jail, can be metamorphosed into any resemblance of the neat and chaste edifice represented in these drawings, it will certainly be an improvement gratifying to our citizens.

68. Hay Sloops, Duane-alip. W. J. Bennet. Water colors. The great reputation which Mr. Bennet has already obtained in this kind of painting will, we hope, prevent the visitor from passing over his pieces carelessly. This is one of superior merit. It shows like a reflection of the real scene in a camera obscura. It has everything of nature but sound and motion.

75. Half-length miniature of a Greek. H. C. Shumway. A delineation full of majesty and grandeur, which cannot be too much admired.

91. Boy and Pigs. W. S. Mount. Notwithstanding the rather unpleasant operation which closes the earthly career of this respectable class of animals, they certainly enjoy a degree of gentlemanly ease and retirement not often allotted to their keepers. They are here luxuriating in the straw, and with the boy, who leans lazily on the fence, form a very comfortable, though not poetic, emblem of tranquillity and contentment.

109. Flower Piece. Pretty, natural, and by a lady.

109. Pen Drawing. View of the tomb of Archimedes. C. Edwards. A very labored and beautiful specimen of industry and skill.

141. Portrait of the artist. W. Dunlap. True as life.

164. Portrait of a Little Girl coming from School. W. Dunlap. The girlish expression of this face could scarcely be surpassed, and proves the fame of the painter to be well merited.

168. Professor Griscom. Waldo and Jewett. We do not remember to have ever beheld a more faithful likeness.

170. Little Girl and Book. J. Freeman. Full of expression. She looks as if she had misspelled a word, and expected to be sent down to the foot of the class.

178. Cavern and Waterfall at the Kaatskill Mountain. G. Marsiglia. One of the most striking pieces in the collection.

197. Fish. Mount. In themselves beautiful objects, especially when, as the artist has painted them, overspread with various bright hues. The substantial air of raw beef in another part of the room, is by no means so appropriate a subject.

We have been tempted to bestow more attention upon these paintings than we originally intended, partly from having discovered, since our last notice, that many of them have not before been offered to the public inspection, and partly because a more careful examination convinces us that the present is altogether superior to any previous exhibition of the institution. It is indeed extremely creditable to the contributing artists, and richly merits the encouragement with which, we perceive, the fashionable world is already beginning to reward their labors. By the way, it is a consideration not to be forgotten, that while a crowd of charming faces smile upon the amateur from the canvass, he stands a fair chance of meeting others equally agreeable, unpainted but by "the cunning hand of nature."

ENGRAVING.

We may safely congratulate ourselves that a taste for the fine arts is annually becoming more widely diffused throughout the land. The impulse with which music has advanced is obvious to all; painting is by no means stationary; and, among the rest, engraving is making rapid progress; and the American people manifest an increasing disposition to encourage it. But a few years ago it was considered hazardous to publish any plate above mediocrity, and even then not until patronage had been secured by previous subscriptions. The public are, however, no longer indifferent to these subjects, and their liberal support has already produced several deserving artists, and numerous pieces of superior excellence. Among others we have before us the proof impressions of Peabody's "Views of New-York," now in the course of publication. They are among the most beautiful which have come under our observation. The work is printed in handsome style, and will soon be ready for delivery.

THE DRAMA.

We have once more three theatres in full operation. It cannot be expected, nor would it be agreeable to our readers, that we should enter into a particular criticism of all their performances. Besides, it often happens that each establishment puts forth its strongest attraction on the same evening; and it would require a certain power of ubiquity, not possessed by us, to notice them all, unless we were to fall into the custom prevalent with some, but, we beg the reader to believe, contrary to our practice, of animadverting upon pieces which we have never seen. When Cinderella is announced at the Park it is fashionable for everybody to be there—"us, of course." The Chatham has re-opened, under very favorable auspices. The interior is quite tastefully decorated, and in the company are several first-rate performers. At the Bowery, Messrs. Booth and Hamblin have been driving a pretty heavy tragedy business, as also Mr. Forrest at the Park and Mr. Pelby at the Chatham. At his benefit on Monday evening Mr. Forrest produced the new tragedy of "Caius Marius," which was completely successful, if we may judge from the repeated plaudits of an overflowing house. We intended to have given an analysis of this play, but have been prevented by a pressure of other matter. The following lines on "duty" are good, and were delivered by Caius with great effect:

"There's not a virtue in the human heart
But may be cancelled by that little word;
And when men do what fiends would startle at,
They lull their conscience with a sense of duty."

It has been said that the town is unable adequately to support three theatres, and we are inclined to the same opinion, unless a very different mode of management shall be adopted from that hitherto pursued. What the proper plan is we leave to the discernment of those most concerned.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 110.

"The pound of flesh, which I demand of him,
Is dearly bought, 'tis mine, and I will have it."

THERE are many crimes not within the pale of law; crimes against generosity and feeling; and, somehow or other, they have always seemed to me more contemptible because they are committed in safety. Although my secluded and sedentary habits have, in a great degree, chilled the ardor of passion, yet even my blood passes with increased warmth and rapidity through my veins, when I behold a man, who, from the ostensible performance of the duties of an honest citizen and a good christian, acquires a reputation for piety and virtue, beneath which he tyrannizes over the poor, and tramples on the hopes and interests of the helpless and unhappy. The wretch who breaks recklessly through all the laws of society; who scours the seas in search of booty, waging fearless war against every nation, although he excites our abhorrence and indignation, is not totally destitute of a power to command something like respect: a tribute which the soul involuntarily pays to talent and courage; but there is nothing to qualify the contempt with which we regard him who perpetrates depredations upon the unfortunate, whenever he can do so without compromising his personal safety, who cringes down like a fawning spaniel to the laws, whose spirit he violates, and who thus betrays all the evil propensities of the open villain without his daring. If any thing can deepen the hue of such a character, it is when religion is his disguise, and woman is his victim.

The Genius came to me the other day, as I was engaged in meditation. His brow was dark with anger, and I feared that he was about to display some dreadful feature in the disposition of my fellow-creatures.

"Alas," I observed, "what new scene of grief awaits me? Observation has taught me but too well that, while hundreds of outcasts from society, under a different train of circumstances, might have borne, with happiness and honor, all the relations of social life; others, who grow up with unsullied name, and who move on equal terms with the great and the learned, want only freedom from restraint to render them despised. What new malefactor will you unmask?"

"He whom I am about to place before you," said my companion, "is not malefactor, at least as you mortals use the phrase. He is honest and industrious. He pays his debts, he loves his family, and he moreover believes himself to be a christian; for he goes through the ceremonial of worship with regularity and apparent sincerity. But thou knowest, Master Student, christianity is not a system of words and forms. It finds not vent in pompous donations to win public applause, nor even in the prayer ascending from the carved and lofty church. It is a spiritual essence, dwelling in the soul, with benevolence and affection; and shaping the thoughts, feelings, and actions according to the rules of moral justice. However the blind and giddy world may be deceived by false show, be assured that the benevolent Creator of man reads the heart, and if kindness and charity are not written there, the rest will pass for nothing."

"And yet," said I, "when we reflect upon the immense opportunities possessed by the better classes, in a thronged and commercial metropolis, to increase the source of human happiness, or cheer the sorrows of the wretched, by the exercise of the most simple virtues, it is strange that the noble and graceful impulses of nature could be so much checked and thwarted by mean and paltry interests."

"The subject," said my companion, "is one of deeper importance than even you imagine. Nothing is a more pleasing object of contemplation than a good man anxious to render those about him happy. Nature has not given us all genius, wit, or beauty; but every man may be kind and charitable, and may regard his own necessary interests sufficiently without entirely forgetting or sacrificing those of others. All the anguish resulting to society from the acts of avowed criminals, and which subject the perpetrators to the dungeon or the scaffold, is less than that which grows out of those violations of good feeling, in the innumerable walks of private life, over which the law exercises no jurisdiction. The glass will discover to you an example, wherein you may perceive the result from the one and the other."

I beheld a man struggling against the world. He was haggard and poverty-stricken; and while crowds of cheerful beings, in comfortable and often elegant attire, were hastening by on every side, and the sounds of laughter broke on his ear, and the flashes of each glittering and costly garment dazzled his eyes, as they rolled by, and bore the wealthy in pursuit of pleasure, this ragged, wretched, friendless, and hopeless old man—for on his sick countenance were the marks of age as well as the print of sorrow—stood the meanest object in the throng, and wondered why he was born. He wished to die. His soul delighted in the idea of resting, even though it were in the grave, from the weariness, the privation, the bleak and desolate misery which, in the place of all these splendors, fate had allotted to him; but while the young, the beautiful and the happy were cut off from their summer joys, and languished on the sick bed, and then died, and were borne in their cold and mournful loveliness, to lie with the sleepers in the church-yard, he, in his misery, still lived on. And then he felt the gnawings of hunger; and, in a kind of desperation, he stole a pocket-book from a wealthy man, was detected—tried—condemned. Nothing could appease the rage of him against whom the theft was committed. He cursed him, and cast him into prison.

"Unhappy man!" I exclaimed.

"Pity him not," said my companion. "It is not my wish to shed a false interest around the fate of the guilty. He has broken the laws of his country—it is just that he should pay the forfeit. Cast another glance into the mirror."

There was a poor woman at labor in a mean hovel. She had once known better days, but that was over; and although to her, also, the world was bleak and dreary, she was industrious—not dishonest. Her character she cherished, for the sake of her children as well as for her own; and, by the exercise of her skill in making artificial flowers, which, in bygone times, she had learned as an accomplishment, she had been enabled to keep her little household clean and neat; and often—for brief gleams of sunshine sometimes fall upon the lowliest and darkest path—often happy. They were friendless, it is true, but they were also innocent, affectionate, and pious; and when the world threatened them, and the cloud of some impending calamity darkened over their heads like the brooding tempest, they lifted up their hearts to God, and were soothed and elevated by their conviction of his mercy. Among other misfortunes it was their lot to be in the power of a cruel landlord, a cold-hearted and bad man, who closed his eyes and his soul against every thing but money. He had labored to amass wealth, and would forego nothing of his income. "Other people must take care of themselves," and when the widow or the orphan pleaded, he retorted with the brutality of Shylock. Mercy was not in his "bond," and he would have his "pound of flesh."

The poor widow and her little family had been long occupied in fashioning the pretty flowers that adorn the brow of beauty, perchance, in the midnight revel. Alas! she dreams not that its leaves have been nourished with the tears of the wretched! A few weeks' delay would have enabled her to dispose of them to advantage; but her tyrant would not brook delay. So she set off mournfully to part with her little stock at an auction sale, where she hoped to receive at least sufficient to discharge the rent. They were put up in neat boxes with some expense, for the poor woman knew how much farther appearances went with the careless world than considerations of kindness for the afflicted. But few attended the sale; and, among others, the very man whom I had seen so enraged at the unhappy wretch who stole his money. This individual purchased them for a few cents a box, for nobody bid against him, and bore them to his place of business. When the widow knew that all she had to depend on had been sacrificed, she declared herself ruined; but a bystander, touched by her distress, took her aside and advised her to appeal to the generosity of the purchaser.

"I know him well," said the stranger. "He is one of the most respectable of our citizens. He is himself a husband and a father, and can, therefore, fully appreciate your situation. Besides which, he is a member of the church, and, should his natural feelings fail to prompt him, he will restore your little property from the dictates of a religion which commands him to 'do unto others as he would have them do unto him.'"

Trifling as this incident was, I watched the denouement with increasing interest, for I began to perceive that the Genius was no longer leading me through the regions of fancy, but was actually disclosing an occurrence of real life. The child of misfortune dried her eyes, and hope was once more cheerful in her bosom. She went tremblingly to his store, and, as well as her diffidence would permit, narrated the simple circumstances of her history and the cause of her errand. But her expectations were not realized. He had just sold a box; and he found that every shilling he had paid would produce him several dollars.

"My good woman," he exclaimed, "I cannot assist you

I live by my business, and must make the best of it. If I had made a bad bargain I should have borne the consequences. This is a good one; I cannot yield the advantage."

The widow went to her home—and found it desolate, for the landlord had distrained on her goods. The successful speculator on so small a scale, hied him to church and bent his head in prayer!

"Mark," said the Genius, as he disappeared with a pensive smile; "mark how piracies may be committed under the mask of religion even at the thresholds of your doors, in the broad streets of this great city. This is the way to be rich, but not to be a christian."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Mr. Carey's Essays.—We conclude the publication of these papers in the present number. Although not light and gay, like those whose only aim is to amuse, so clear and authentic an exposure of facts cannot be uninteresting, and a general knowledge of them may relieve the distress of thousands. We trust, therefore, that, for their appearance in our columns, the indulgent reader will require no better apology than our desire to facilitate the exertions of their author in improving the condition of the poor, but honest classes. The subject possesses more powerful claims upon general attention, from its close connection with the moral character of a large portion of the community.

American Dictionary.—Recent accounts bear testimony to the increasing interest which the literature of this country is exciting, not only in England, but on the continent.—The publisher of the American Dictionary in London had nearly a thousand subscribers before the work was half printed. At the head of the list are some of the royal family and several of the ministry and nobility; and on the continent many subscribers, in Germany, and the Netherlands, and some in Vienna. In a number of periodicals and papers, the work is commended in as favorable terms as its best friends can desire.

As this dictionary is now adopted in many, if not all our universities and colleges, by the higher officers of government, and by congress, as their standard, it becomes important that the primary schools of the country should procure the author's elementary books, in order to insure uniformity in orthography and pronunciation. Incessant and unwearied efforts are making to introduce, or continue in use other elementary books, whose different orthography tends to keep the language in perpetual fluctuation, and confound both teachers and pupils. Most of these are sold cheap—very cheap—but really for more than they are worth. They have the old orthography of the age of Elizabeth, copied most absurdly from Walker, but long since obsolete, and now ridiculed in England. The orthography of Webster's elementary books is modern and uniform; and his scheme of notation is universally admired for its simplicity.

Love and suicide.—A young girl, aged sixteen, and described, in a late London paper, as of prepossessing appearance, has lately added one to the numerous and melancholy list of females who have fallen victims to a passion generally regarded with ridicule. The object of her love was a young man named Alders. She left her home in Chancery-lane, and went to Richmond, with the intention of committing suicide, in which she too well succeeded. Since the coroner's inquest the following letter, addressed to "Mr. G. Alders," was discovered in her bed-room at her father's house:

"Once more, and for the last time, I venture to address you. That my love for you is hopeless, is beyond question, but a wound is implanted in my heart that time will never eradicate, nor shall I ever love another. To live, then, is impossible. I cannot. Farewell then, farewell for ever. Ere this letter reaches you, the unhappy and rejected Clara will have met a watery grave. Adieu for ever, Clara."

This is not to be classed among the fictions of the day, but seems to have come from an authentic source. While the unhappy victim of neglect, but more of her own unregulated feelings, affords a proper subject of compassion, we may easily trace in her character the effects of a careless education. It is probable that her mind has been rendered morbid by an injudicious perusal of novels and poetry. Nothing is more fatal to a sensitive disposition than a habit of turning from the practical realities of life, and contemplating the images with which gifted writers people the world of romance.

Concert.—A concert of sacred music will be given at the Paraclete church, on Wednesday evening, the eighteenth instant. We have only room to observe, that Mrs. Austin will appear, with other powerful attractions.

THE WIDOW.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY—COMPOSED BY BISHOP.

With mournful expression but not too slow.

I can-not love an-o-ther, I can-not cast a-side The dark weeds of a wi-dow For white robes of a bride. I ne-ver more may lis-ten To Love's be-guil-ing voice, The sad heart of the mour-ner Can make no se-cond choice

SECOND VERSE.

Oh! offer nought but friendship,
And I will be your friend;
Speak only of the lost one,
And mark how I'll attend;
His portrait hangs above us,—
Dare not to breathe love's name,
Those dark eyes, could I listen,
Would frown upon my shame.

THIRD VERSE.

And, see, my child clings to me,
And looks up in my face,
He has no other parent
To fondle and embrace.
Unconsciously his finger
My wedding-ring hath prest,
As if it were to chide me
For smiling on my guest.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE BARBER.

THE barber is ex officio a politician. He will discuss you the merits of the candidate, for office, as well as the most jaded beer drinker of his ward. Now this is saying a great deal, for a beer drinker is also a politician, ex officio; and many old politicians choose to shave themselves, sooner than to be out-talked and out-vied by the knight of the brush and basin. The barber is indeed a most astonishing fellow. If the person he is torturing be a merchant, he talks of flour and cotton, indigo and tobacco, and if he discovers him to be from the land of nullification, he denounces the tariff, and declares that he would like to see every mother's son of the down-easters smothered in mush-and-molasses. If the operator be a lawyer, the operator modestly (for lawyers are a superior class of beings, and even Monsieur Shaver bends the knee to them) asks his opinion of the revised statutes; but the dread in which he is held by him is not a sufficient guarantee from the incessant fire of his tongue. If the doctor comes in, he wishes him joy of the wet weather, asks him if sore throats, coughs, colds, and consumptions are plenty, and slyly hints that he has heard his patients are as grave as ever. He is also a good physiognomist, and knows well whom he has to deal with, and it is his own fault if he is not a good craniologist. The village barber mortally hates a Yankee pedler, having suffered so much by way of excellent razors, shaving soap, washballs, &c., and no sooner does he see one of these wooden clock, horn-flint, and oak-leaf Havana cigar-makers approaching his shop, than he makes up his mind to shave for half price, and be cheated into the purchase of a razor which will be warranted to shave into the bargain. The barber is—in short, he is a thing that shaves and talks and talks and shaves until his unlucky hearer wishes him at the bottom of the sea, and never ceases except when he stretches forth his hand to receive the reward of his labor, and then he thanks you, but whether for your money or your patience is a problem not yet solved.

Epigrams.

"NON-INTERVENTION."

As understood by the "five great powers."

Non-intervention used to mean
To let a man alone,
To settle matters as he could,
And quiet pick his bone.

But now, in this enlightened age,
It means just the reverse;
Not what you please, but what we please—
We bear both sword and purse.

Thus the "five great dispensing powers"
To honest Belgium say,
"Choose whom you will to be your king,
"For certes choose you may

"But mind, my honest friend, if you
"Fase by the king we choose,
"A man might better just be hanged
"Than in that rascal's shoes."

"THE UNION."

England and Ireland ever are at strife
About the mastery, just like man and wife;
They quarrel, swear, and fisticuff away,
And can't keep quiet even when they pray;
At court, at feasts, at church, and every where,
They scratch, and caterwaul, and tear their hair.
A century they've held this rare communion
Of sweet domestic bliss, and called it "Union."

"THE THREE DAYS."

Quoth Hodge, a country bumpkin of renown,
To an old neighbor just returned from town,
"What do they mean down there by these three days,
'Bout which they such a mortal potter raise?"
His friend replied, "O 'twas a glorious thing,
The people rose against a tyrant king;
The bristling bayonets met with dauntless breast,
Resolved to die or see their wrongs redressed;
For three whole days the stubborn fight maintained,
Won a great victory—and nothing gained!"

IMAGINARY HAPPINESS.

We have so few real sources of happiness in this world, that I am always glad to get as many imaginary ones as I can.

MUSICIANS.

Musicians are apt to be jealous of each other. I once heard of one who experienced envy at hearing a mock-bird sing.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1861.

NUMBER 46.

For the New-York Mirror.

YES, ONCE MORE I AM FREE.

Yes, once more I am free
From her bright and silken chain,
Her lip, with all its witchery,
Shall smile on me in vain:
Her eye is very bright,
And her cheek a modest red,
And her neck a very lily white—
But her stony heart is dead.

In my verses once I said,
That she was quite a Hebe,
And the pert reply she made,
Was "pray, sir, who may she be?"
It cut me to the heart,
But I never let her know it—
That a word from such as she, should start
The feelings of a poet.

And now the unkind girl
Has sent me my dismissal,
And my brain is in a rapid twirl,
From reading her epistle;
When my faith has thus been plighted,
It is very, very cruel,
That my hopes should thus be blighted
And myself shot in a duel.

I—who had pinned her shawls,
And tied her shoes and bonnets,
Gallanted her on morning calls,
And loaded her with sonnets;
Who gave her rings and other things,
In such expensive numbers,
And always flew on Cupid's wings
To serenade her slumbers!

But once more I am free
From her bright and silken chain,
Her lip, with all its witchery,
Shall smile on me in vain:
Her eye is very bright,
And her cheek a modest red,
And her neck a very lily white—
But her stony heart is dead!

ORIGINAL TALES.

RANDOM SKETCHES.—THE MAD POET.

I HAVE ever had but little compassion for that numerous class of individuals who set out in their career with the intention of doing nothing, and after a variety of revolutions are wound up with having nothing to do. Their usual resort, under such circumstances, is to become misanthropic, groan over unmerited misfortunes, and complain of the uncharitable coldness of the world. After a while, they begin to talk of the little there is in this life worth living for. They speculate upon the easiest method of going out of the world, and try it upon their neighbor's dog. They purchase poisons for their own taking, and are the death of all the cats in the vicinity. And after this, if they avoid the insane hospital, and gain wisdom from experience, they will sometimes settle down into very domestic, paternal, and honest men.

I have a personage of this description in my eye at present. From the circumstance that I have called him, by way of distinction, the mad poet, you will perceive that I do not consider lunacy at all essential to the perfection of this character. The greatest living bard is probably one of the most sane, quiet, and harmless of mortals. But my friend, Mr. Silver, thought differently. He imagined craziness to be the height of inspiration, and founded his whole system of conduct and composition upon this very erroneous principle. The natural consequence was that in worldly estate he soon found himself completely in the vocative; and though entering life with a considerable fortune, he was blessed at the age of twenty-three with the disagreeable incumbrances of a wife and a couple of children, without a cent, a friend, or a prospect in the world. I have said without a prospect, but it would be more proper to say with but one prospect—that of utter starvation; for he had no business, or knowledge of business, and though he was certainly entitled to affix Dr. to his name, it would have been only to signify debtor, and not a doctorate of law, physic, or divinity.

I was first introduced to Mr. Silver about six years ago, in a coffee-house in Boston. He was a genteel young man, with a fair address and agreeable conversation, but in his ideas altogether too diabolical. A modest man, and no poet, like myself, could not stand it. His language was a continual hyperbole. He dealt only in superlatives, and those of the most desperate description, affected Byron, thought well of pirates, and indulged quite a partiality for highwaymen. He had always considered it beneath the dignity of his art to attend in the slightest degree to sublunary matters, and the sole recourse, in his present embarrassments, was to the feelings, and through the feelings to the purses of those of his friends who would be proud to relieve a poet and a man of genius!

The fellow had really some talent and attraction about him, in spite of all his diablerie, and those of his acquaintance who were able to indulge their inclination, freely offered him the use of their pocket-books. But when these calls became more and more frequent, without any prospect of discontinuance, it is more than probable, judging from the analogies of human nature, that they began to fight shy of him. It occurred to them that he ought to be doing something for himself. As soon as Mr. Silver perceived this, he commenced the introduction of his wife and children. He exhibited them upon the canvass in all the brilliant and attractive colors in which his fancy could invest them—bright, affectionate, and happy. And then, reversing the scene, represented them in poverty, darkness, misery, suffering from cold and hunger—and in the back ground a domestic thunder-storm ready to burst over their heads. This took for a while amazingly, and answered for a number of weeks. But this also eventually lost its charms. At every recital he accumulated new images of horror, new epithets to express aggravated misery; but images of horror and epithets of misery began to pall. For the last resort, he talked misanthropy.

"He had lived long enough—too long. He had survived his means and his hopes, was buried in distress, and had but one way left by which he could extricate himself; and to this, sooner or later, and he did not know how soon, he should be obliged to resort."

It was while acting under these impulses that he honored me with a visit on a midsummer afternoon. He was evidently in one of his insane intervals. He stalked into the room and closed the door violently behind him: then folding his arms and gnashing his teeth, he began to promenade my apartment at the rate of ten knots an hour. I was seated quietly at my desk, gazing on him in utter astonishment, and finally threw down my pen to wait patiently for the issue. He at length stopped short, drew a chair violently towards me, and began, after having worked his face into uglier contortions than you ever saw upon the stage:

"Mr. Pennlesse, I have had dreams—horrid dreams. You are my friend, and I am willing to confide in you, for I respect and esteem you. I believe you to be an honest man—and this from me, sir, who never met but one honest man in my life, and who scorn to flatter, you may consider no mean compliment."

I bowed a suitable acknowledgment, and he resumed his discourse:

"Mr. Pennlesse, I am tormented by a fiend that whispers shocking things to me. I have long been tormented by him, and it is strange that I have not before acted upon some of the impulses he has put into my crazed brain."

I crossed my legs and leaned forward in an attitude of earnest attention.

"From my childhood upwards he has haunted me like a shadow, and my whole life has been a continual struggle with him."

I looked the very essence of sympathy.

"Last night he came to my chamber; it was a bright moonlight, and I could distinguish his features: it was still as death, and I could hear his voice. He drew the curtains of my bed, and whispered one word—it was enough." He threw himself back in the chair and covered his face with his hands, when suddenly rising he re-commenced pacing my apartment.

"This is a vile world—a vile, vile world!"

"But pray tell me to what conclusions you have come from the suggestions of the fiend. What did he advise?"

"Shooting myself."

I knew all along what he was driving at, but started back in feigned amazement.

"Shoot yourself—it is impossible!"

"Neither impossible nor improbable, it is strictly true! I have made up my mind."

"But, my dear fellow, consider—you don't know what you are about."

"O, but I do. What have I to live for? I am neglected, cheated, abused. I am overwhelmed with debts and difficulties, and how can I desire to remain a moment longer in a world which has thus treated me?"

"Think of your wife and children."

"No, sir, the thought drives me to desperation. I am resolved—you are my friend, and I wish you to assist me."

"Well, Mr. Silver, to tell you the truth, I am glad to see this. You are a man of courage, and I respect you. Any assistance in my power I shall be happy to furnish. I will not be your executioner, but anything short of that you may command."

I observed that this took him by surprise, and he was at a loss what course it would be proper for him to pursue. He hesitated, however, only for a moment, then rushed forward and grasping my hand, exclaimed,

"I thank you, sir—from the bottom of my heart I thank you."

"But, Mr. Silver, what mode of exit do you intend to adopt?" I asked coolly.

"Why, Mr. Pennlesse, I really have not made up my mind—they are so cautious about selling poison, and I have no pistols."

"Well, Mr. Silver, since your resolution is taken, it is desirable that you should go about this matter as deliberately as possible. Have you any last requests that you wish executed?"

"Very cool to be sure," thought the insane bard, though he did not exactly like to say so. He muttered in a tragedy tone, "No, sir—none."

"Very well, sir, then we can settle it in a few moments. I am not the man to see my friend suffering in this way when I can assist him. You shall not be balked, sir. You are a brave fellow, and we will have it all attended to in the twinkling of an eye."

I then carefully turned the key of my apartment, to prevent all interruptions, went to a small drawer in my secretary, and brought out a brace of pistols, one of which I very carefully loaded, primed, and cocked. Mr. Silver meanwhile was looking aghast on all my movements.

"Here, sir," said I, when the operations were completed, "this little instrument is as sure as fate. There is nothing to fear. My rooms are entirely at your service. Good by, my dear fellow," shaking him affectionately by the hand, "good by. I trust I have been to you a friend in need."

Mr. Silver turned as pale as the wax figure of Niobe in the museum.

"You need not be afraid of getting me into difficulty from this affair's taking place in my chambers. I will get rid of that by some device or other, never fear. Here is the pistol, sir; take it, and I have no doubt that every thing will go off well."

Mr. Silver could not have trembled more violently if I had been threatening to shoot him myself.

"I am afraid, Mr. Pennlesse," he at length articulated, "I am afraid you do not exactly understand me."

"O, but I am sure I understand you perfectly. There can be no manner of doubt about it. You wish to shoot yourself, and I, like a true friend, am desirous of giving you all the assistance in my power—this is the long and short of it."

A man of common calibre, under such circumstances, would have shot himself in self-defence; but, fond as he was of talking, Mr. Silver was altogether too courageous to act upon compulsion.

"My dear Mr. Pennlesse," he exclaimed, "I am aware of your kindness, but it would certainly involve you in inextricable difficulty."

"My dear sir, don't think a moment about me. Don't believe, sir, that I could be so entirely selfish as to waste a thought on my own situation. There is the pistol, sir—do take it."

Mr. Silver paced up and down the floor in very evident agitation. There was a decanter upon the side-board; he approached it, turned out a copious draught of the dark sparkling liquid, and diluted it with a trifle of water. I followed his example, and we pledged each other. When we had drank, I turned to him:

"I see how it is, Mr. Silver, you are fearful on my account, and I admire your delicacy. But, sir, my pistol is entirely at your service—you may take it to your own chamber."

He took it as a thing with which he was not desirous of a nearer intimacy.

"There is one request you will be kind enough to attend to. I set a great deal by that little pop-gun, and I wish you would leave a line on your dressing table, directing that it should be returned to me."

"I will, sir. Good by, for I shall probably never see you again."

I never did see him again. He took seats that very night in the southern stage, leaving my vade mecum directed to my address, without note or comment. I have recently heard that he is now very respectably situated in a comfortable clerkship, and attentive to its duties. He has ceased from his mouthings and tragedy heroism, is as sane as his neighbors, and as happy with his beautiful wife and fine children as he ought to be. Without vanity, I think some of the credit of it belongs to myself.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE FASHIONABLE BONNETS.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—In my way, I am a moderate man; I indulge in sweeping denunciations only as a last resort; and where anxious to convince, would deprecate undue excitement; but, upon my honor, gentlemen, the present fashion of ladies' hats is insufferable. I, for one, have borne with them until I can bear no longer; and I feel that we "lords of the creation" are daily becoming martyrs to the cause of patient endurance under these flaring prodigies.

Pray, sirs, what connection have they with the symmetry of the human form? What, with the original purpose for which a hat was designed? Are they like anything but themselves, and for anything but a chaotic display of extravagance? Did you ever happen to sit behind one of them in the theatre, or under its umbrageousness in a church? and if so, what think you of the splendor of "Cinderella," or the tranquillity of humble devotion? Oh, quakeress simplicity, how do I honor thee! modest and retiring—promoter of thy own comfort, and disturber of no philosophy, (excepting as thou addst a tenfold lustre to the brightest eyes in the world, and thereby dost mock all philosophy,) how charmingly dost thou illustrate, exemplify, and adorn the creed of creeds, "meddle with thine own affairs, and intrude not on the meditations of others!"

Ah! I could tell a tale, sirs, "of one who loved;" how the eyes won a heart, and how the hat lost it; but it matters not; this is an unsympathizing world, and people listen much more readily to their own than another's grievances. I assert, then, that every man in this community, whether married or single, whether young or old, has a wrong to be redressed, which is identified with these monstrosities. All husbands and fathers, for example, must pay for the necessities or extravagancies (the words are growing synonymous) of their respective charges; and, excepting a ring for each finger, a change of bracelets, and a gold chain for every day in the week, I ask, what proportion of a year's expenses appears in the milliner's bill?

Didst ever rusticate in a stage coach, reader? Bandboxes, (ominous prologue!) bandboxes once could be carried in one's lap, or stowed in a corner; time was, even, when, with the traveller's undress privilege, one hat was sufficient for a six weeks' tour; ay! and time was, too, when, bating the bandboxes, the stage-coaches aforesaid were habitable by reason of the then unoccupied space, where now feathers and bouquets, ribbons and points, dart hither and thither, as lawless and as illimitable as summer lightning, to the infinite jeopardy of eyes and good temper. But, alas! those halcyon days of old-fashioned notions and comforts are not among the blessings of the nineteenth century. Two bandboxes are now a full freight for anything with four wheels, excepting only the "Omnibus," and a complement can be laden on board of no craft that floats in our waters. I would not complain of all the afflictions which these anomalies bring upon the community; I could not enumerate them if I would; one might as well count the bows on a bonnet, or the sands on the sea-shore. But there are some considerations which ought not to be passed over in silence, and others which cannot well be endured. I say nothing of an impoverished purse—nothing of the stage-coach monopoly—nothing of the exclusiveness of steamboat occupancy—I bow with something of submission, but more of despair, to the fact that Mrs. Austin was invisible at the last Musical Fund; and I try to remember with patience that, excepting the morning when Miss Blank fainted, and, sky-scrapers and all, was carried out of church, I have not seen the benignant face of my minister, either in the desk or the pulpit, for the last three years. But I will not attempt to describe whatever else is indescribable, nor to recapitulate that which is without the scope of both poetry and prose; yet, when these aerial wonders choke up our Battery, and render our very sidewalks impracticable, I may be permitted to proclaim that "something must be done."

But be it remembered, the denouncers of this fashion are not the only sufferers. I can appreciate the excitement which sustains the ladies under this mountain of millinery, for I have been a "soldier" in my day, and know that the broiling of a July sun, the insidiousness of July dust, the grinding of a heavy cap, and the expression of tight boots, are small matters when set off against those concomitant advantages, which everybody understands; and thus the ladies, for the satisfaction of the display, can afford its trifling penalty. But how is it in a sudden shower, or an unexpected gust of wind? Their banners are drenched and droop forever; they cling, instinctively, to their bonnets, and sometimes, by a mere miracle, are not blown under the wheels of a carriage, or waisted to the skies.

Now, seriously, what is the cause of all this? Is it vanity? Is it an experiment upon the tolerance of the age? Is this huge head-dress a token of rank? Is it the prerogative of nobility in other countries—of aristocracy in our own? Is beauty heightened by it, or are beauty's conquests extended? Are these beau-killers really displayed as beau-catchers? Does good taste approve them? Does any taste tolerate them? If a negative reply be conceded to these queries, common sense would say, (and swear to it,) that the cause is disproportionate to the effect; but common sense knows nothing of the matter; it is unacquainted with the despotism of fashion, and it is removed that it has no concern with its creations!

Good Mistress Candor, decide thou the question—ought, or ought not, we gentlemen to rise in open rebellion against fashionable hats?

There are yet a chosen few who soar above the trammels of fashion, and are not afraid to enshrine their loveliness under a dunstable; who prefer the approval of gentlemen to the stare of impudence—convenience to ostentation—propriety to extravagance; who have enough of benevolence to consult the wishes of others, and of judgment to discriminate between the genteel and the ridiculous; to such I offer my feeble attempts at commendation, the homage of my heart, and the service of my pen.

CASBIO.

COPY OF AN INTERCEPTED LETTER,

From Miss Belinda Zephyr to Olivia Avenel.

MY DEAR OLIVIA—I need not say that I am infinitely obliged to you for introducing me to that delightful creature. His name it is useless to mention, you must know the gentleman I refer to; if not, call to mind all those agreeable and handsome gallants I met at your father's house during my long stay there, the most agreeable, beautiful, and divine. You cannot mistake. Though to leave these generalities a moment—say a black, quick, and speaking eye—a classically shaped nose—a couple of rubies cut by a line of pearl for what mortals call a mouth—and dimpled chin—just in that condition to have suited the capricious Beatrice, neither with a beard, nor with no beard. Add to this a well-cut ear, dark hair, not curled, a fine figure, genteel dress, a heart, a soul, and an intellect, and you have the whole picture. There he is to the life, and you will not have the impertinence to tell me that I am a bad painter. They say love paints to the life. If it is true, though to be sure that cannot be reasoned from in my case, because I am hardly in love—but if it is true, why then—no matter.

All the young ladies who have seen him at our house have been delighted with him. He called the first day after my return to bring me the trinket I left on your toilet, (how kind in you to think of it!) and besides that a flower or two he picked at Mr. Doubloon's hot-house, of the most beautiful description you ever saw. He talked an hour or two on botany, and it has quite spoiled me for the lecturer's. I shall never go near his stupid classes again. There was so much life, so much poetry about him; so much of the spirit that can enjoy the woods, the streams, and the flowers, that he talked absolute music. You would have been delighted to hear him. I thought before that Mr. C. was interesting, but I have given Susan my ticket for the rest of the course.

Since then he has been here almost every day; he seems quite pleased with something or somebody—I don't know what or whom—probably my father's conversation and Susan. How delightfully he plays upon the flute! Did you ever hear any thing sweeter or richer than the tones he draws from that fine instrument? When we were at school we used to read about Orpheus—I suspect that Mr. P. is a revivification of the old musician,

"Eurydice the woods—
Eurydice the floods."

I believe they called his lady's name Eurydice, and he was very much attached to her. I wonder if P. will love his wife as much?

I hear that he is very highly spoken of at the bar, and if so he must really be perfect. A botanist, a poet, a musician, an advocate, handsome, agreeable, correct, and affectionate. What more can be desired to render a man perfect? My dear, dearest Olivia, ten thousand times ten thousand thanks for introducing him to me; and your attention in sending him over to me with that little trinket I left behind I shall never forget. Blessings on you forever, my love, and believe me yours,

BELINDA.

P. S. I understand that he is not rich, and papa may consequently object. But if he does, and P. proposes an elopement, I shall not hesitate. Would you?

THE PATRIOTIC DESCENDANT OF A HERO OF '76.

Mr. Jeremiah Jogtrot had the misfortune to be (in vulgar diction) a gentleman born; I say misfortune, because his gentility was all he had to depend upon. He was a true chip of the old block, (the Jogtrots had for centuries been office-hunters, ex familia), hated business, but loved politics. A sixteenth cousin of his grandfather had had the lucrative appointment of commissary-general during the revolution; and on the strength of the services which Captain Abimelech Jogtrot (that was the commissary's name) had rendered his country, the whole family of the Jogtrots were continually petitioning government for pensions, rewards, &c. and as continually exclaiming against the ingratitude of their countrymen. Whole reams of paper were blackened with accounts of the services of this sixteenth cousin, and all the sympathetic words in the English language were exhausted to paint the distresses of this family of neglected patriots; at length, after the last quire of the tenth ream of paper (which had been bought for the purpose, but not paid for, it being the motto of the Jogtrot family that payment of debts was beneath the dignity of a true patriot) was exhausted, and which, by the way, had been filled with diabolical accounts of their sufferings, Mr. Jeremiah Jogtrot received an appointment of about eight hundred dollars a year. Then it was that the family of Jeremiah Jogtrot began to look down upon the other branches of their race. Mr. Jeremiah himself cultivated his whiskers, put on the look of a statesman, and shook his head whenever politics were introduced. Mrs. Susanna Dorothea Jogtrot commenced a series of masquerades and balls; and, somehow or other, always forgot to invite her relations to them; but if any of them came to see her, they were sure to be treated with so much politeness that, ten to one, it would be their last visit. A year passed on. Mr. Jeremiah looked graver than ever, and Mrs. Jogtrot still continued her balls. The salary of Mr. Jogtrot, as we have mentioned before, was eight hundred dollars per year, and he spent at the moderate rate of three thousand; at length it was discovered that, true to the customs of his ancestors, he had been living at the expense of Uncle Sam, and, at the time of the discovery, he was a defaulter to the tune of ten thousand dollars. Being promptly removed from his office, the feelings of Mrs. Susanna Dorothea were so deeply wounded by the ingratitude displayed by her country, that, under the signature of Mrs. Jeremiah Jogtrot, invectives without number, were heaped upon the powers that were, every third line figuring with the words "descendant of a revolutionary hero," "son of a patriot," "proverbial ingratitude of republics." At the same time her sight began to improve, and the myriads of Jogtrots again became friends; another ream of petition paper was produced; and, when all hopes had failed, Mr. Jeremiah Jogtrot, being a man of sentiment, took to drinking beer, and spouting at ward meetings, whilst his charming better half employed herself in acquainting the world with the wrongs of her husband and the deeds of her ancestor, Colonel Abimelech Jogtrot.

Those incidents happened some years ago, since which time Mr. Jeremiah held an office under the common council of this our goodly city; but he was removed from that partly on account of its being suspected that he entertained feelings hostile to corporation feasts; but more especially because he neglected to laugh himself into a fit at one of Alderman Adleplate's jokes, which, although repeated a thousand times, never failed to excite general approbation before, an offence which the good alderman never could forgive. What became of them afterwards I know not; it is likely, however, that they have removed to some more patriotic city, where they have, doubtless, received the reward due to the descendants of the hero of seventy-six. Be this as it may, we have no reason to regret their disappearance, for we have but to look around for hundreds who are as much like the Jogtrot family as can be wished.

W. B.

JOHN HORNE TOOKE.

Mr. Croly is acknowledged to be an agreeable writer; but his late work has, in several instances, been severely handled. Our correspondent, although he can be expected to throw very little additional light upon a subject which has been so long and repeatedly scrutinized by the nation most interested in the discovery, has, nevertheless, given the author of the Life of George the Fourth a very deserved reproof. We insert his communication, less as arguments in favor of the identity of Junius and Tooke, than as a critique upon that production.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—In glancing over the "Life and Times of George the Fourth," by Mr. Croly, I observe that the author takes a rapid view of men and things, without being over solicitous in regard to facts, and thereby subjects himself to draw erroneous inferences from unsubstantial premises. I will cite a few instances in corroboration of this assertion.

In speaking of the authorship of Junius he says, "Burke had more of the vigor, the information, and the command of language; but he was incapable of the virulence and the disloyalty. Horne Tooke had the virulence and the disloyalty in superabundance; but he wanted the cool sarcasm and the polished elegance, even if he could have been fairly supposed to be at once the assailant and the defender."

This, it is believed, is the first time that Mr. Tooke was ever considered deficient in the use of sarcasm and tartness of language in controversy; for which, indeed, he has been distinguished in a pre-eminent degree. His biographer, Stephens, gives the following description of him:

"His eye was eminently expressive; it had something peculiarly keen, as well as arch in it; his look seemed to denote an union of wit and satire. When he surveyed a stranger, he seemed to take a peep into his heart; and in argument it was difficult to withstand the piercing sharpness of his vision, which appeared but to anticipate the triumph of his tongue. No one was better calculated for colloquial disputation; or that dual-like controversy exhibited by two disputants when pitted together, with the breadth of a mahogany board only between them. In such an arena he was invincible; wit, humor, learning, temper, genius, all came in aid of argument; and when he made his most deadly thrusts, it was with a smiling countenance, and without any seeming effort or emotion.

"He always reminded me of Ulysses, as described by Homer, both in person and address, artful, insinuating, and dauntless. At first his appearance was unpropitious, but gaining on his audience by degrees, after some time he seized and retained possession at pleasure, both of their hearts and understandings; and, when obliged to contend for superiority, he conducted himself with seeming modesty; unassuming and temperate, he received the charge of his antagonist without emotion, repelled his assault with interest, and finally ended by becoming victor.

"The sarcastic remark of Mr. Wilkes in early life, that the 'parson never laughed,' was, in some degree, verified in his latter years. It was evident that no one could tell a story or enjoy a joke better; but he seemed in general to keep his passions under control, and seldom or never exhibited signs of that obstreperous and convulsive merriment which others so frequently display and enjoy.

"In political affairs Mr. Tooke was prone to suspicion, and always seemed to think himself justified on such occasions, in attributing the springs of human action to the worst motives. When he found his jealousy realized, he would then freely indulge in attacks, both personal and political; and, on such occasions, no one was better calculated to 'give the bastinado with his tongue.' Wit, ridicule, sarcasm, were each employed in its turn."

To the above I will subjoin an extract from a review of the Life of John Horne Tooke, by W. H. Reid, contained in the London Quarterly Review for June, 1812. The article is said to have been written by Lord Ward. It is, perhaps, needless to add that the author and publishers were inimical to the political principles of Mr. Tooke. The passage referred to is as follows:

"He (Tooke) had a quick sense of the ridiculous, and was a great master of the whole art of raillery; a dangerous talent, though the exercise of it in his hands was always tempered by politeness and good humor. No man, we believe, ever provoked him by a hostile attack without having reason to repent of his rashness. He was possessed of all the means that can make his retort terrible; ready poignant wit, perfect composure and self-command, boldness confirmed by the habit of victory in that species of combat, and a heartfelt bitterness, which, when he was once emancipated, by the indiscretion of his adversary, from those restraints which good breeding imposes, poured itself forth in a torrent of keen, unsparing, irresistible invective."

If the character given of Tooke in both the above works can be relied on, it would appear that he was not incapable of using sarcasm, either cool or ardent. As to polished elegance of writing, any one who will critically compare the letters which passed between Junius and John Horne, in their supposed quarrel, will have reason to be convinced, not only that in elegance of style neither has the preference, but, in fact, that they were all written by the same hand.

The object to be attained by the fictitious quarrel was evidently to give the writer an opportunity more fully to expose the character of John Wilkes, with whom a serious dispute had been carried on, and who had declined any further correspondence with John Horne. It had also the double effect of blinding the eyes of the public in regard to the authorship of the letters of Junius.

Mr. Croly says, that "the discovery (of Junius) is now beyond rational hope; for Junius intimates his having been a spectator of parliamentary proceedings even farther back than the year 1743;" and then inconsistently hazards a conjecture, "that Junius will be found, if ever found, among some of the humbler names of the list," mentioning Lloyd, Boyd, Greatrakes, &c., who were private secretaries to men of eminence at the time, and young men when the letters were written.

I am not aware of any such intimation from Junius as alluded to by Mr. Croly; but, admitting the fact, it is not entitled to the least consideration, being no more than one of the many arts made use of by Junius to delude his pursuers, and thereby escape detection.

Mr. Croly, after taxing his brains pretty severely on the subject of Junius, and hazarding an extravagant conjecture, concludes, like the fox in the fable, that "the question is not worth the trouble of discovery." Why did he take up the subject at all, seeing he could throw no light upon it? His ignorance of the character of one of the candidates at least, whose claims he undertakes to invalidate, is apparent.

In fine, Mr. Croly, to give variety to his book, and, perhaps, to gratify his own vanity, has written upon a subject for which he was not prepared. Many superficial readers, notwithstanding, will probably, from his dogmatical assertion, be persuaded that Horne Tooke did not possess the cool sarcasm displayed in the letters of Junius, and therefore could not have been the author; but those better informed will perceive that he was tout-a-fait fitted for the work; and that the incidents of his eventful life are so interwoven with the spirit and sentiments contained in those letters, as to extinguish every vestige of doubt upon the subject.

MARCUS.

SPANISH LITERATURE.

The literature of Spain is less known among us than it ought to be. With the exception of Don Quixotte, there is scarcely a Spanish work which has attained to a general circulation in Europe or America. Yet there are many writers, especially those belonging to what is called the golden age of poetry in Spain, richly deserving the attention of the rest of the world, among whom may be enumerated Garcilasso de la Vega, Villegas, the two brothers Lupercio, Bernardo Rebolledo, Argensola, Luis de Leon, Francisco de Borja, Lope de Vega, and Francisco de Quevedo, who are called, by way of distinction, the nine Castilian Muses. To the works of these distinguished authors may be added the history of Friar Gerard, by Father Isla; with the exception of the inimitable Don Quixotte, perhaps the wittiest satire to be found in any language, ancient or modern. The object is to ridicule the faults and bad taste of the preachers of that day; and it is not the least singular circumstance attending this work, that it was written in Spain: in an age of bigotry, by an ecclesiastic, and praised by the inquisition. There is nothing in English literature comparable to it, except it be Echard's "Causes of the Contempt of the Clergy;" which is, however, inferior to Friar Gerard in humor, variety of character, and in the want of a connected narrative.

The gravity of the Spanish character and language associates admirably with humorous satire; and the literature of no country I am acquainted with, contains more exquisite specimens of this species of composition. Among these the works of Quevedo are great favorites with his countrymen, little known abroad, though they were translated anonymously, and printed in Edinburgh in 1798. His satire is more harsh and his humor less amiable, if I may so express it, than those of Cervantes and Father Isla; but he possesses a great capacity for exhibiting knavery and folly, and correcting the foibles and vices of mankind.

His "Treatise of all things whatsoever and more besides, by the most learned and expert Dr. Wiseacre; dedicated to the company of busybodies and the society of babblers," though written early in the seventeenth century, has a shrewd application to some of the grave laborious triflings of the nineteenth century.

MAY DAY.

This was, in old times, one of the most charming rural festivals of England. The morning was consecrated to walks and rambles into the woods and fields, with music, blowing of horns, and adorning the broken branches of trees with nosegays and crowns of flowers. The afternoon was employed in dancing round the May-pole, which was hung with flowers, and left standing all the rest of the year.

This custom is also common in Italy, and is derived from the ancient heathen festival of Flora, the goddess of flowers, adapted to the manners and habits of a more polished, or at least a more decent people. The honest old chronicler, Stow, beautifully tells us that "on May day in the morning every man, (in London) except impediment, would walk into the sweet meadows and green woods, there to rejoice their spirits with the beauty and savour of sweet flowers, and with the harmony of birds praising God in their music." He adds, "in the reign of Henry the sixth, the aldermen and sheriffs of London being on May day at the bishop of London's wood, and having there a worshipful dinner for themselves and other comers, Lydgate, the monk of Bury, sent them by a pursuivant a joyful commendation of that season, beginning thus:

"Mighty Flora, goddess of fresh flowers,
Which clothed bath the soil in lusty green,
Made buds to spring with her sweet showers,
By influence of the sun shee, shee,
To do pleasure of interest full cleane,
Unto the states which now set here,
Hath Ver sent down her own daughter dear."

There have been better rhymes than these on a May day, but they are curious, as being written by one of the very earliest poets of England.

Mr. Strutt says the Mayings are still kept up in England, but the exhibition is but the shadow of the original sports. It was never general in the United States, probably on account of the little inclination the early emigrants had for rural dances and sports, and the circumstance of our lagging northern climate too often presenting the first of May in the disguise of north-eastern winds and cold pale sunshine. The day, it is well known, is however celebrated in New-York by a general moving, and a fearful exposure of the household gods.

VALENTINE'S DAY.

St. Valentine, as he is called, was a presbyter of the primitive church, beheaded under the Emperor Claudius. In the old illustrations of the common prayer book, we are told "he was a man of most admirable parts, and so famous for his love and charity that the custom of choosing Valentines upon his festival, (which is still practised,) took its rise from thence." Mr. Brande, in his illustrations of the Antiquitates Vulgares, maintains that there is no authority for supposing St. Valentine was more famous for love and charity than other saints. The probability is, that the custom of sending Valentines and using divinations on this day, originated in the popular opinion that the birds choose their mates about this time. Almost every day in the calendar was consecrated to some saint in the Romish church, and the coincidence of the martyrdom of St. Valentine with the supposed period of the choice of the birds, naturally made him the patron of the day.

The custom of sending Valentines and drawing lots for future husbands and spouses, I believe was never much practised by the people of the United States, and is now almost unknown. Gay, who of all the later English poets, is the most faithful bard of genuine rural life and manners in England, thus describes the ceremony of a Valentine's morning:

"Last Valentine, the day when birds of kind
Their tender mates with mutual chirpings find,
I early rose, just at the break of day,
Before the sun had chased the stars away;
Afield I went, amid the morning dew,
To milk my kine (for so should housewives do);
There first I spied, and the first again we see,
In spite of fortune shall our true love be."

PARABLES.

Precepts are the more easily comprehended and retained in the memory, when clothed in parables.

STANZAS.

To Miss M. C. E. on the demise of a young sister by a distressing and sudden casualty.

"No bitter tears for thee be shed,
Blossom of being! seen and gone.
With flowers alone we strew thy bed,
Oh, best, departed one!
Whose all of life—a rosy ray—
Shed into dawn, and passed away."
"Weep not for the youthful dead,
Sleeping in their lowly bed;
They are happier than we,
Howsoever brief we be!"

She hath passed away, like the breath of spring—
Like the bloom on its new-born flowers;
Ere a sullying world could its shadow fling
O'er her pure and youthful hours;
While her heart was soft—while her cheek was fair
As morning's blush on the summer air.

She hath gone where existence is pure and bright,
A cherub, to glory given,
Where her young eye swims in untold delight
Midst the vernal scenes of heaven;
And in pastures green, where no ills betide
Thy gentle sister is glorified!

In the sunny glow of her primal hours,
Like a budding rose, she faded
As the dews exhale from the spring-time bowers
Ere their gorgeous hues are shaded;
Now, by "living waters," her footsteps stray
In the golden light of a perfect day.

Should we mourn that death, on a fiery plume,
O'er her shrinking form hath driven?
That she sunk to sleep in the quiet tomb
When the fetters of earth were riven?
That she sighs no more on her mother's breast,
But smiles in the regions of endless rest?

Ah! life is bright to the young and fair
When the fountains of love are gushing;
Then a stainless beauty invests the air,
And the skies with its glow are flushing;
Then every feeling is pleasure's own,
And hope beguiles with her syren tone.

But earthly love is a passing dream,
And the heart, too soon awaking,
Must implore in vain for its vanished gleam
O'er the clouded spirit breaking;
Tis a matin ray on life's stormy shore—
It passeth soon—it returns no more!

Yes! the heart swells high in the coming on
Of that joyous spirit-fever;
Yet how soon love's smile from the brow is gone,
And from life's uncertain river;
Like the tints, dissolving on Alpine snow,
Or a cloud that melts in the sunset's glow.

Then weep no more. Bid thy tender heart
Restrain each throb of pity;
From earth the sinless and young depart
To a glad "celestial city."
When the shore of time is a desert strand
Who would weep for those in "the better land?" W. G. C.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

SKETCHES FROM THE DIARY OF AN EDITOR.

TUESDAY. Read and reviewed three novels, a quarto dictionary, and three octavo volumes of travels; wrote an account of the present state of the world, cut up the legislature and the corporation, and criticized the performances at the two theatres last evening; also the grand oratorio and Mr. Wiseacre's lectures on ornithology; received and rejected nine communications, and went to dinner.

Afternoon. Three beautifully bound volumes on my table. Albums! from the three Misses Damper, with a request to hand them over the next morning to Mr. H., then to Mr. W., Mr. J., and indeed nearly all the letters of the alphabet. What would the fair nymphs have said could they have heard the welcome I gave them? What must be, however, as some learned logician declared, must be; so I sat me down, and endeavored to put my poetic machinery into operation.

"Confound the women!" I muttered, as I dipped my newly mended pen into the inkstand, and with contracted brow prepared to compose something soft and airy. "Confound the women. I wish the whole sex were at the bottom of Lake Asphaltites." And so I wrote—To Miss Clementina J. Damper,

Could these bright eyes, whose every glance
Sends blissful raptures through my frame,
Could they but—

A knock at the door introduced to my notice a little person, with spectacles and a cane—an imitation gentleman; whom, although arrayed in new attire, you could detect for a vagabond and a quack by a single glance. With a bow, which was evidently intended as a graceful one, he said,

"I presume I have the honor of addressing the editor of the—?"

"I am the editor, sir."

"Then, sir, I appeal to you to enlighten the world upon the subject of my new pectoral, mysterious, revivifying, anti-dyspeptic syrup. It relieves every thing, sir. Consumption, croup, cancer, colds, fever and liver complaints. It renders the voice clear and sonorous, and is therefore extremely beneficial to vocalists and public speakers. It makes the hair grow, and prevents the tooth-ache. I wish you to mention me in your paper; and also publish this certificate, which I assure you is a voluntary thing on the part of the person by whom it was drawn:

"This is to certify that I, John G. Brown, of the state of Missouri, did for many years labor under—"

I cut him short, and having succeeded in sending him about his business, not without difficulty, sat down once more to Miss Damper's album. I had not, however, read further than "blissful raptures," when a man came in with a piece of sponge, about as large as my head. He flung it down on the table, so that it upset the inkstand on Miss Damper's album, and said,

"Do you see that, sir?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Well, what do you suppose it is?"

"Why a piece of sponge."

"Well, but is it not a very beautiful specimen—soft as satin, and almost as white as snow?"

"It is really a very pretty piece, indeed."

"Very well, sir; now I want you to say just so much in your paper. I live five hundred and seventy-nine Barlow-street, opposite Patrick Quin's grocery-store, and I want you to give me a puff."

As he departed a fellow about six feet high entered, with a large cow-hide, and walked gravely up towards my chair. I hastily ran over in my memory all my satirical pieces, for I thought my time had arrived.

"Are you the editor of the —?"

"I am, sir," said I, boldly.

"Well, Mr. Dickenson desired me to hand you this."

"And pray who is Mr. Dickenson?"

"Why he makes gentlemen's fashionable canes, and wants you to give him a little lift in your paper. He says he makes the best canes, horse-whips, and cow-hides in the city."

"Cow-hides, fellow!" said a strange voice. "What do the public care about cow-hides? Let me speak. Have I the honor of seeing the editor of the —?"

I nodded assent, perhaps a little impatiently, for I thought there was a pretty fair prospect of the three Misses Damper's albums going home spoiled by one of my worst incipient efforts. The new intruder, with many flourishes, informed me that he was a schoolmaster.

"I, sir," said he, "belong to the new system. I teach on improved principles; so easy and expeditious, that my scholars learn more in one week than by the ordinary method they would be able to acquire in a year. I not only teach them quick and well, but you see I teach them cheap. My plan is to begin at the foundation and to proceed upwards, on such short, clear, comprehensive, and extraordinary terms, that the natural eye and the understanding are both struck at the same moment, and study becomes an actual delight. You see, Mr. Editor, I've a natural tact. In six lessons I teach drawing; in six more three or four different kinds of painting, including botany; I perfect a boy in English grammar in twelve; and in a fortnight he is completely competent to write the best poetry, and indeed every species of composition; a few more lessons, and he understands elocution, singing, and playing on the piano, guitar, and harp, flute, flageolet, and violoncello; and, by a few familiar lectures I communicate the art of chirography, so that no one can fail to write a neat, rapid, and beautiful hand. The tyro is instructed in geography by the aid of a machine, wherein the oceans, seas, lakes, &c. &c. are represented by real water; where little mountains are erected, and continents and islands resemble the real world. Now, sir, I have written an editorial article, which I wish you to print as your own, and—"

But I will not longer trouble the reader with my pedagogue, whom I dismissed as soon as I could in decency. I immediately proceeded to finish Miss Damper, when the devil broke in upon my poetic aspirations with the awfulest cry of copy.

"Copy, Peter. You have enough. Why the critique on the theatres last night takes up two columns."

"Yes, sir, but one of the plays was changed, and we thought you'd wish to wait till some other time."

"The deuce—and the literary notice of the quarto dictionary?"

"It's lost, sir. We looked in all the drawers, and it's nowhere to be found."

"And how is the state of the world?"

"Set up, sir, and the men waiting for more."

"Mistress sent me for the books, sir," said a little, red-headed fellow, with a green baize apron.

"Books?" What books? And who is your mistress?"

"The albums, sir. Miss Damper sent me for 'em. She's going out of town."

"Pray, sir, what may you want?" said I to a bald-headed, stupid-looking fellow, who stood bowing and scraping at some distance, with a bottle in his hand.

"Sir, I'm the man that invented the compound Asiatic mercurial syrup for the growth of the hair. I wish you to say something about me in your paper."

I was prevented from replying by a boy, who came running breathless into the room.

"Well, sir, what now? More mercurial cerate, or have you come to announce the invention of a plan to keep people in a hurry from getting out of breath?"

"Mr. Hopson, sir, told me to give you this as soon as possible."

Mr. Hopson was one of my most valuable correspondents; he had written an article in which the word "communication" occurred three times in four lines, and, to obviate the tautology, I had taken the great liberty of substituting "information" in the place of one which did not at all interfere with the sense. This note informed me that I had spoiled his article; he wished the press stopped, and the piece taken out. He would write for me no more. It was my privilege to reject what did not please me—a privilege which no one could dispute—but never to alter."

Before I had finished his epistle another was handed me from a young poet, some of whose verses I had rejected. They were not even fit for an album. The note ran thus:

"Sir—If you refuse my poetry, which has been pronounced by competent judges to be a piece of very superior merit, I should like to know why you publish such stupid trash as you do every week in your silly paper?"

This cost me thirty-seven and a half cents postage.

"What shall I give the men for copy?" said Peter.

My friend Jennings dropped in at this crisis. He is a professional lounge, and an interminable talker. He entered puffing a long whiff of blue smoke from his lips, with the air of one who luxuriates in the enjoyment of the real Havana, and as he stretched himself out on three chairs, he exclaimed, "How d'ye do? What an easy time you editors have. Nothing to do but scribble a little. No responsibilities, no fears, never offend any body, never get offended; who would not be an editor?"

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

FRENCH OPINIONS OF ENGLISH ACTORS.

Translated from a Parisian periodical for the N. Y. Mirror.

YOUNG was educated under the patronage of John Kemble; and, wanting creative talent, he had the good sense to model himself upon this great tragedian. John Kemble himself could hardly have been called an actor of genius; he had talent, judgment, ambition, extraordinary diligence; and these qualities, aided by the advice and inspiration of his sister, the inimitable, sublime, perfect Mrs. Siddons, enabled him to overcome his defects of natural genius, as well as the disadvantage of a bad voice and embarrassed utterance. In a certain line of characters he reached the perfection of his art. He has been surpassed in the representation of the fiercer and stormier passions; but in heroic warmth and elevation, in those brilliant traits of character and sentiment which an ordinary actor never attains, and which few readers comprehend, he has never been equalled in England. He was of a noble figure, of an antique physiognomy approaching the Roman—and it seemed that the toga was his usual garment, so gracefully did it sit upon him.

Young is smaller; his features are fine, but ~~unfeminine~~ as iron. He possesses great power of lungs, and exercises it without pity; his energetic declamation fills the ear with such imposing sounds, that he disguises not only a natural imperfection in his speech, but the terrible havoc he makes with the sentiments and metre of his author. It is impossible to imagine a situation with more comic desperation in it than that of a poor author at his first representation, while Young is improvising new readings in the text, and maiming the measure of his verse. In spite of all this, his declamation is so majestic that passages mutilated even to absurdity are received by the multitude without a murmur, sometimes even with applause. Young wants inspiration; he never created a part; he was never successful but in imitating the style of Kemble, or when parts have been expressly composed for him, as in the pieces of Mr. Shiel. We must except, however, the part of Iago, which he plays understandingly, but without flexibility or trick, and in which he does continually wear the mask of profound perfidy. His favorite part is that of Pierre, in Venice Preserved; a character audacious, reckless, braving danger and death like a hero of male-drama.

and consequently a favorite with the mob in the galleries. He represents also with much force and truth, the death of Beverly, in that medley of low wickedness and pitiful horror which passes for a tragedy, under the title of the Gamster. Many people have been struck by the resemblance between Young and Saint-Prix.

KEAN appeared like a meteor upon the stage at London, without being preceded by any reputation, even provincial, and was received as a prodigy. It was the last year but one of John Kemble, and this veteran of tragedy suffered the mortification of being deserted for a debutant. We will not undertake to decide whether this was infatuation or charlatanism, or real rivalry of talent. Some years before, Kemble had received a still more humiliating affront: the public had abandoned him to attend the miserable representations of a precocious child, who, at an advanced age, was hardly a respectable actor. However that may be, Kean proved the possession of original talent and very rare powers: he displayed a terrific energy, a true imitation of the passions, and succeeded particularly in the expression of malice and cruelty; he retraced the rude traits and savage passions of gothic tragedy with great historical fidelity. He appeared for the first time in the Shylock of Shakspeare, and this part was always one of his best. Richard the Third is his master-piece in the eyes of the multitude; but connoisseurs are of a different opinion: he shows energy in it, malignity, sarcasm, but no trait of that courage and grandeur inseparable from the remorseless but not undignified ambition of this tyrannical prince. Among his poetical and historical characters, one of the most admired is that of Sir Giles Overreach, an ambitious usurer and hardened villain, enriched by the spoils of the widow and orphan, and eventually foiled in the grand object of his enterprises. But in the opinion of men capable of judging, his great success has been in the third act of Othello, in which he exhibited himself for the first time, simple and pathetic.

The career of MACREADY has not been a noisy one. If the journals have praised him it has been with reluctance, and because they could not withhold it. He appeared in London about ten years ago, and advanced, step by step, to the highest rank in his profession. He commenced with the pieces of Shiel, then played Hamlet, Macbeth, and Richard the third, and finally created the character of Virginus, one of the most brilliant on the English, or even on any other stage. When Mr. Harris retired from Covent-garden, on account of ill health, Macready left the theatre a long time before his genius was entirely developed, or his character perfectly formed. From this moment he seemed to retrograde. His manner became affected; he aimed at striking and original points. His frequent provincial excursions confirmed him in his bad taste. He renounced the heroic school; his playing lost its noble correctness and simplicity. One would have thought him infatuated by the style of Kean. The public journals blamed with justice this abuse of his happy dispositions. Macready is reserved, not to say haughty, difficult in the choice of his connections, consecrating his time to the pursuit of literature; for he is a profound scholar, and lives in the bosom of his family, or in the society of his intimate friends. He is consequently by no means popular, and has fewer partisans than envious or prejudiced detractors. His faults have been exaggerated and his talents diminished with the most marked injustice. He has latterly reformed his playing, and abandoned affectation and charlatanism for a noble simplicity. This reform has not yet won for him either the mob or the journalists, but it has been the occasion of his brilliant success at Paris. Macready possesses neither the grace nor the dignity of John Kemble, but he infinitely surpasses him in warmth and pathos. He does not equal Kean in the expression of a fiendish malice, but is at least as excellent in the imitation of violent passions, surpasses him in dignity, and knows how to employ more powerful and more varied arts of exciting the emotions. Young is advanced in years, and has no creative power, and Kean is too much exhausted to study new characters; and it is upon Macready that the tragic art in England chiefly depends. ***

NATIONAL PROSPERITY.—The only criterion of national prosperity with most people is their own. Yet the excessive wealth of one portion of the community is always balanced by a corresponding poverty of the others. The same money cannot be in more than one hand at the same time. Generally, if not universally speaking, the gain of one is the loss of another, and thus the national wealth remains the same. The circulation of money is like that of the blood, which, in proportion as it rushes to one part of the body, leaves the others pale and impoverished.

SONNETS ON THE BLUES.

I.

Grim-visaged imps, that in your dusky flight
Circle about my miserable head,
Bringing clouds darker than the darkest night,
And heavier than a canopy of lead;
Called by whatever name you bid me write,
Glooms, horrors, devils black, blue, brown, or red,
Hence let your sullen course be quickly sped,
And bid the cloudless skies once more be bright,
Or I shall soon be numbered with the dead,
Whom poets fable by the Stygian river,
On their own melancholy fancy fed,
Standing in groups to meditate and shiver:
Scatter these clouds, this darkness dissipate,
Grim-visaged imps, or seal my silent fate!

II.

Delicate creatures, with dark glossy hair
Streaming down necks that mock the driven snow,
With eyes like stars, lips that like rubies glow,
Cheeks glowing with the rose, they are so fair!
Who love to wander where the wild-flowers blow,
And find hard names for them in scholar's books;
Who linger where the silver waters flow,
By the far-stretching lakes and running brooks;
Who love to ponder on the poet's pages,
And offer incense at the poet's shrine,
Who listen to the learned lore of sages,
And scorn not lay as light and gay as mine:
Come to my dreams, come to my waking hours,
Bright creatures, with your poetry and flowers!

LITERARY NOTICES.

Savonarola: an attempted tragedy, in five acts. By J. C. M. Harrisburgh. H. Welsh. p. 77. 1831.

THIS tragedy contains more original flights of genius than any similar effort since the days of Shakspeare. It was elicited by the reward which Mr. Forrest recently proposed, and is dedicated to him; but, with the modesty naturally attendant on true talent, was not presented among the other pieces. The author now submits it to the world in a printed form, from the consideration that "managers and distinguished actors are so continually pestered with manuscript dramas, that they rarely attempt to peruse them."

Notwithstanding the touches of pathos, and the familiar colloquial beauties liberally sprinkled over its pages, we are constrained to fear that the fullness of managers, and the blindness of the public are such, that this truly interesting production will not be represented on the boards of our theatres; although we frankly declare, as good and true critics, that we should derive more gratification from witnessing the very first line betrays a shrewd knowledge of human nature, and a sort of presentiment of what would be the reader's own thought before he had completed the perusal.

"Accursed be the hour I learned to read," &c.

The dialogue between Julio and Savonarola is highly dramatic, and affords a veteran player opportunity to show off his attitudes, &c. and is what adepts insure histrionic literature term stage effect.

Savonarola. Julio, my boy, come sit with me.

Julio. Gladly, father.

Sav. Father!

Julio, my love, what didst thou study last?

Jul. Some poetry, father.

Sav. Ha—indeed, what was it?

They are interrupted by the entrance of Luca Corsini, a gentleman of Florence, who, in the course of a little chat with his host, puts a very impertinent question to him, and one not always likely to receive a satisfactory reply.

Cor. ——— and the house—

Sav. Is mine.

Cor. Ha! proprietor?

Where didst thou get the cash, my honest friend,
To build or buy it with?

Now that was going a little too far, and against all the rules of genteel society. Savonarola, however, turns the conversation like a sensible fellow.

In the next scene Rinaldo, the leader of the banditti, forms a wicked resolution, the execution of which is prevented by some weighty considerations.

Rinal. I'll kill him! [Aside.]

Jacopo. Brother—canst thou doubt my love?

Sav. Oh no, it is your interest to be faithful;
Your life depends upon my breath; I save it
Because, though we were born of different mothers,
My father's blood doth circle in thy veins,
But warns them not, for thy base mother's mixture
Adulterated the pure stream.

Jaco. You shall not slander my dead mother, sir!

I care not if you slay me on the spot,
You shall not jibe at her.

Sav. I do crave thy pardon, brother, dear brother—

'Twas rashly spoken, and most undeserved.

Jaco. You ask my pardon!—oh, it is enough.

No offence.

Sav. (to Rinaldo) As for you—

I leave your life as an acquaintance—you

Saved mine once—now we're even, fare ye well.

You may retire. Farewell Jacopo,

I admire thy spirit.

Jaco. Farewell, dear brother.

Rinal. Farewell, dearest friend.
(Aside) He has some feeling, so I will not kill him,
He's a good swordsman too.

Among other attributes of this author is a neat and easy way of getting rid of his characters.

Trefina. I shall not trouble thee, nor any, long.
Girolamo, I crave but one embrace
Before we part for ever. [She embraces him.]
Farewell, my love—'tis done; I've swallow'd poison.
How I adored thee! Thou believ'st me now—
I loved and love— [Dies.]
Sav. Indeed she loved.

He is also happy in avoiding the necessity of entering into details. Nothing is more unpleasant for a man of real genius than to be examined on particulars. It reminds us of a famous hand at telling a story, who was relating how he once outstripped a deer in fleetness. "It was a beautiful summer morning," said he, "and I was hoeing corn, when a fine doe sprang by me, and I after her, and in less than ten minutes I succeeded in catching her." "Well, that was very extraordinary," said an incredulous friend. "Why, the truth is," added the other, "I should not have done it so easily, but for the fact that there was a pretty hard crust of snow on the ground, which the animal's hoofs broke through, while I ran easily on the surface." "How could there be a crust of snow on the ground when you were hoeing corn on a beautiful summer morning?" asked his auditor. "And pray what's that to you, sir?" said his companion.

We do not know whether the author of Savonarola is as successful in replying to impertinent interrogatories, but he nicely conducts his friends behind the scenes on such occasions.

"Come, as we walk I'll tell thee all about it."

And in another place,

"Come in with me and I will tell thee all."

This Rinaldo mentioned above, is evidently a cunning fellow, and knows the value of things. In one of his soliloquies he says,

"What a wise villain Girolamo is.
How well he duped the whole society:
They chose him treasurer—and but made me king!"

As in Shakspeare, we continually find hit off characters existing everywhere around us. How many of these valuable citizens do we meet?

Austina. Thou know'st the doctor, (true he was unlicensed,
But yet a learned and skilful doctor.)

Giuseppe Nerli and Signior Corsini, it appears, did not live on the best of terms.

Giuseppe. [To Nerli]—

Nerli. [To Giuseppe]—

Cor. My dearest friend, I meant none I assure you.

How truly tragic, and who can deny the verity of the following?

Gla. The grave is voiceless, and the dead prate not."

How naturally the friars are painted:

Austina. When I proclaimed—

"Girolamo Savonarola is Duly elected Prior of San Marco,
According to the senate's just decree,
Empowering us to choose one in the stead
Of him appointed by the banish'd tyrant,
Who held illegally that dignity,
And now has doubly forfeited his rank,
By treason to the commonwealth."
With startled looks and dropping under jaws,
They gazed upon me—why the very friars
Who voted for him, little thought that he Would be elected—they did so to scatter
The votes, and thereby stand some chance themselves;
They would have voted for themselves, if they
Had not been sworn against it, and besides
Afraid lest their hand-writing should be known.

What heart so dead to all the finer feelings as not to be moved by the affecting recital of Lorenzo Savello?

"By some strange fatality none of my letters ever reached my friends," [Mr. William T. Barry, the post-master general, will be gratified to learn that there is neglect in the post-office department of Florence, as well as of the United States,] "and a relation, supposing me dead, has taken possession of my property," &c.

We cannot sufficiently admire the prudence of Savonarola, as exhibited in the closing line of the subjoined extract:

Cor. I know the man is craz'd—yet he may do
Your sacred character much harm, with those Who know you not, throughout all Italy,
Where there are myriads on the watch—and anxious
To wound the cause of liberty through you.
Sav. What would you have me do? I'm innocent.
Cor. Quiet this brain-sick wretch with gold—or—
Sav. I understand thee, but I will not do it,
Unless all other means should fail, and then
I would not do it either.

A lover breaks forth in the following impassioned strain to his mistress. What female heart could stand it?

"Stop
And then thou canst control resistless love.
But not before; ah! not before!"

Another energetic piece of imagery:

Sav. Shall we, who dreamed not the lion's roar,
Shrink at the crowing of a Gallic cock?
Citizens and Counsellors. No! no!

The envoy in whose presence the above address was made very naturally concludes that they are not going to accept his terms, so he prepares to depart.

Envoy. Is this your answer?—then I pity you,
And take my leave.

He must, however, have been rather unpleasantly surprised on finding that he had to stay and have his head cut off.

The critical reader will be able to perceive the great merit of this tragedy without further examination, which indeed we have prolonged beyond our usual limits, in consequence of a desire to bring this indigenous shoot of talent into the notice which it merits.

Annals of the Peninsular Campaigns, from 1808 to 1814. By the author of Cyril Thornton. 3 vols. 12mo. Philadelphia. Carey & Lea. 1831.

Although these annals are from the pen of a successful novel writer, the subject, in a great degree, excludes the play of fancy, and indeed original composition of any kind. The labors of his contemporaries have already furnished able and accurate histories of the important occurrences which ushered in the nineteenth century. The author, however, frankly acknowledges himself indebted to the works of Colonel Jones, Colonel Napier, and Mr. Southey, and declares that the object of the present publication is merely to embody, in a more familiar and attractive form, the elaborate details and most interesting events embraced in the accounts of the others. He was himself present in several great battles of the peninsular war, and therefore hopes that he has been able to acquire, "by personal observation, a knowledge of many important localities, which he trusts will be found to have produced a beneficial influence on his narrative." This is true only to a limited extent. An actual examination of the scenes of the campaign is certainly calculated to impart a more accurate knowledge of localities, and to strengthen the confidence of the reader in his representations; but a soldier, personally engaged in a battle, is not, of all others, likely to possess either the most general understanding of the surrounding occurrences, or the clearest impartiality in describing what really took place within the sphere of his observation. In the present instance, however, we will do our author the justice to say that he writes boldly, and yet with the greatest apparent candor. There is about his descriptions an air of truth, which excludes the idea of any intentional deception, and the writer has rendered his subject, which is intrinsically of such deep interest, more agreeable by the charms of a graceful style. The work is printed with the neatness which characterizes every thing from the prolific press of Carey and Lea.

The Talba, or Moor of Portugal. A romance. By Mrs. Bray. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 201, 183. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

Mrs. Bray is already known to the reading world as the author of the "White Hoods," the "Protestant," and one or two other productions much above mediocrity. Although it may appear unjust, yet it is impossible to refrain from comparing every thing in this shape with the romances of Scott, and they are so immeasurably superior to any thing of the kind which this generation can hope to see again, that we are inclined to peruse the efforts of less successful writers rather as a duty than a pleasure. It is, therefore, creditable to the present story that it fixes the attention. It is interesting, and, in point of style, occasionally eloquent and poetic. A scene in the second volume, between the prior and the Moor, Cassim, is described with force and satire. Indeed, had the work been produced previous to the publication of the Waverley novels, it would have certainly made a more decided impression. But like many of the same tribe, its real merits are dimmed by contrast. Had it been written when the triumph of the "northern enchanter" was in its meridian, it would not have been read at all. Not to be hyperbolic, we would resemble the Waverley novels to the sun, whose decline is the signal for the re-appearance of the thousand lesser orbs, which the brightness of his presence had long rendered invisible.

The Museum of Foreign Literature.

The May number of this journal contains its usual quantity of spirited, amusing matter. We have before had occasion to name it to our readers as one of the best publications of the kind in this country. Although merely a re-print, it is crowdedly so, and its selections are made with great taste from the most ably conducted periodicals extant. We extract the following from the last number, in which it is credited to the Englishman's Magazine:

"I spent all save the dawning of a long day of hard service, far from the din of European strife, under the scorching suns of the east. Even amidst the forests of Nepal the name of Bonaparte sounded like a spell. While his ambition was condemned, his genius was admired, his misfortunes deplored; often have I wished to encounter him face to face; the closest approach, however, that fortune enabled me to make to him was by a pilgrimage to his tomb.

"When at St. Helena, I started one morning with a small party of brother officers to survey the spot where the remains of the world's agitator are deposited. The peculiarities of the locality have been laid before the public so often and so amply, on canvass and on paper, that further description is needless. The character of the scene is profound and awful loneliness—a dell girt in by huge naked hills—not an object of vegetable life to relieve the general aspect of desolation, except the few weeping willows which droop above the grave. The feeling of solitude is heightened by an echo that responds on the least elevation of the voice. With what singular emotions I took my stand upon the slab which sheltered the dust of him for whom the crowns, thrones, and sceptres, he wrung from their possessors, would of themselves have furnished materials for a monument! There the restless was at rest. There the emperor of the French, king of Italy, protector of the confederation of the Rhine, grand master of the legion of honor, reposed with almost as little sepulchral pomp as the humble tenant of a country church-yard:

'After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.

I withdrew my foot—removed with my handkerchief the traces it had left upon the stone, and gave a tear to the fate of the exile. I, also, was a soldier of fortune—our party quitted the place with dejected faces, and scarcely a word was spoken until we reached our quarters.

"On the following morning a French frigate arrived from the Isle of Bourbon, having on board a regiment of artillery. The officers solicited and obtained permission to pay a tribute of respect to their old leader's ashes. I accompanied them to the ground, and rarely have I witnessed enthusiasm like theirs. On the way not an eye was dry, and some who had served immediately under 'the emperor,' wept aloud. As they drew nearer to the spot, their step became hurried and irregular, but the moment they saw the tomb, they formed two deep, and advanced with uncovered heads, folded arms, and slow and pensive pace. When within five or six yards of their destination, they broke off into single files, and surrounding the grave, at uniform intervals, knelt silently down. The commander of the frigate and the others in succession, according to their rank, then kissed the slab; when they arose every lip was fixed, every bosom full.

"In a few days subsequently, the officers of both countries met at Soliman's table, and after dinner the first toast proposed by the French commodore was 'the king of England—three times three; I really thought that the 'hip—hip—hurra' of our ancient enemies would never have an end. An English gentleman returned thanks, and proposed 'the memory of that great warrior, Napoleon Bonaparte.' The pledge went solemnly round, each wearing, in honor of the mighty dead, a sprig of his guardian willow. The evening was spent in concord, many patriotic toasts were reciprocated, many good things were said, and the blunt sincerity of military friendship presided over our parting."

The Young Draftsman's Companion.

This little work forms a useful auxiliary to students in the art of drawing. It contains thirty-two pages of letter-press, and upwards of thirty engraved designs, well calculated for the use of beginners, with some sensible rules and lessons on the method of engraving in aquatinta.

A WISH.

FROM THE GERMAN OF MATTHISON.

Would I might once before my spirit sink
Into the blest, elysian world of shades,
Visit the happy fields where childhood,
Leapt in its dreams of heaven, joyous reposed.

The humble bush which hides the linnet-nest
In its cool shade, waves with a sweeter hum,
My friend, than all the groves of laurel
Over the ashes of a conqueror!

The brook that cuts the meadow, where a boy
Lathered violets, runs with a sweeter murmur,
Through alders which my father planted,
Than the Blandinian silver fountain.

The hill, where many groups of happy boys
Swung on the branches of the linden tree,
Delights me more than the high mountain
Bathing its summit in the golden sunbeams!

Would I might once, before my spirit sink
Into the blest Elysian world of shades,
Visit the happy fields where childhood,
Leapt in its dream of heaven, joyous reposed.

Then may the minister of death, in smiles,
His torch extinguish. I will gladly haste
To Zenophon and Plato's wisdom,
And to Anacreon's bright myrtle wreath.

On the marriage of William Off to Miss Eliza Moore.

She's taken Off—that maid so dear,
Her frolic plays are o'er;
She once was more than angel here,
But she is now no Moore.

THE FINE ARTS.

ORATORIO AT ST. PAUL'S CHURCH.

THE spring oratorio given by the Sacred Music society of New-York, took place on Wednesday, the twelfth instant, and was attended much better than the preceding one, of which we published a full report. Mrs. Austin and Madame Brichta were the donne engaged, and a Mr. Taylor, whom we never heard before, and are not exceedingly anxious to hear again, afflicted us as the principal tenor singer. There was no principal bass singer engaged. The orchestra was full of individual talent, of which a fair specimen is afforded by the following names: Mr. Hill, principal violin; Mr. Taylor, lately of the ancient concert, London, first double bass; Mr. Boocock, first violincello; Mr. Schott, principal clarinet; Mr. P. H. Taylor, principal flute, and Mr. Norton, principal trumpet. Yet, notwithstanding this array, if we are asked did the band play as well as that of the Park theatre, we answer directly—no; nor can any band arrive at perfection which is not accustomed continually to meet under one leader. It is strict unity of idea and action which creates orchestral perfection, and that, practice alone can achieve. Nevertheless, we by no means charge this as the fault of the society; we know, on the contrary, that it results from the impossibility of obtaining musicians who can devote their time and attention to the interests of a performance which occurs, perhaps, only twice in a year. The musicien d'état naturally adheres to those institutions which furnish continual employment and a regular salary throughout the season, as is the case in the theatres. Talented professors, such as we have named, who have pupils in the city, occasionally lend their aid, it is true; but they cannot afford to lose their valuable time for the sake of rehearsal, and yet rehearsal is as necessary to general effect as individual talent to a concerto. For this very reason we have to compliment the choral department of the society. We really cannot conceive the "Hailstone Chorus" to have ever been executed with more precision and spirit, and the difficult double chorus, the "Horse and his Rider," demands our warm approbation. The chorus, likewise, which has been selected from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza de Tito," was admirably given—we cannot say the same of the accompaniment. Mr. Norton's beautiful and silvery tone in the marcia with which it commences, was direfully contrasted with the dead tin-kettle kind of sound which emanated from the tuba and the second trumpet, whoever filled it with air. This was also very perceptible in Handel's "Occasional Overture," which, however, on the whole, was well performed. "Let the bright Seraphim" and "Angels ever bright," were sung by Mrs. Austin, with the soli parts of the "Horse and his Rider"—and, on the part of Madame Brichta, a bravura by Cianchettini, with violin obligato accompaniments, and an Italian air by Morlacchi, also the soli parts of a motetto, by Mozart. The beautiful and pathetic song, "Angels ever bright," afforded a fine example of the "portamento di voce," as laid down by the great masters, lately quoted by our correspondent B., and a triumphant specimen of Mrs. Austin's ability in giving effect to legato movements. The fire and truth imparted by the simultaneous execution of "Let the bright Seraphim," with Mr. Norton's accompaniment, is an additional proof that, whether in the orchestra, or in obligato passages, for a voice and instrument, the continual practice together of professors is the surest road to success. Hence it is, that the morceaux for voice and trumpet are better executed by Mr. Norton with Mrs. Austin, than with any other vocalist in the country. We have heard him essay them with Mesdames Feron, George, and Gillingham, but never with decisive effect. With Madame Feron, her infirmity of voice, when opposed to the clear and powerful tones of the trumpet, appeared to disadvantage; with Miss George there was a want of power to assist the beauty of her quality of voice, and an evident absence of union between it and the instrument; in the case of Miss Gillingham, we thought her style too tame; but it is only justice to add that the pitch of the trumpet and band, when we heard her, were at variance, and therefore further comparison is impossible. Madame Brichta sang the Italian air, "Notte Tremenda," (by the way an odd selection for a church) sweetly, and with much chasteness. She was accompanied on the organ very effectively by Mr. Blondell, and by Mr. Taylor on the flute. The bravura which she sang during the former oratorio, by Cianchettini, was repeated, and accompanied brilliantly by Mr. Hill. Madame Brichta is improving fast in the acquirement of the shake, which is indispensable as an embellishment of sacred music. In conclusion, after being regaled by such a performance, it only leaves us anxious that this society should renew its efforts. It is not almost disgraceful that no one torio has been given in this city in a complete form? Why can we not have the "Messiah," the "Creation," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," or Heber's "Palestine," by Dr. Crotch? The choral department of such oratorios could be executed finely; and assuredly there is vocal talent enough to secure a quartette or quintette of principal singers in the town.

THE THEATRES.

Miss Kelly has appeared at the Park. This lady has experienced some critical asperity, to which she is exposed by several glaring faults in her style of playing; but, it would be treating her with undeserved injustice to deny her many excellent qualities. She is full of animation, and, when not tempted to overstep the sphere for which she is best fitted, both by nature and education, she rarely fails to command attention and elicit applause. There are many, even among the intelligent classes of the community, who consider her an actress of very superior merit, and who will sincerely regret that the present is her farewell engagement. Mr. Barry, as Joseph Surface, in the "School for Scandal," was even better than usual. In such parts he is inestimable. Mr. Barton, as Charles, would not bear comparison with Barrett in the same character. A new afterpiece, entitled "Comrades and Friends," has been produced, as performed in London with, we presume of course, "unbounded applause." It is very interesting, and full of striking and beautiful incidents, and would deserve most unequivocal approbation if, unfortunately, we had not seen precisely the same thing in Damon and Pythias; except that the tyrant of Syracuse is disguised in a cocked hat and red coat, under the title of Colonel Somebody, and the two heroic friends appeal to the exhausted sympathies of the public as privates in an English regiment, stationed we do not exactly remember where. We have not seen such a piece of barefaced impudence for many a day. The utmost stretch of ingenuity to which this truly original dramatist has spurred himself, is in altering the mode of preventing the "Damon" man from returning according to promise. With the most extraordinary exertion of skill, he makes the Lucullus (who, by the way, is promoted to the rank of a silly midshipman) set a vessel on fire instead of killing a horse. The only real claim to originality was the character of Mrs. Blake, which, we must do him the justice to confess, it has never been our good luck to encounter, either on the stage or in real life. It was, however, performed uncommonly well. Cinderella has passed its thirty-fourth night, and continues to attract numerous and fashionable houses.

The Bowery and Chatham are going on prosperously. Mr. Hamblin, Mr. and Mrs. Barrett at the former, with little Miss Fisher; and Thayer, Blake, Hyatt, Mesdames Hughes and Giffert at the latter. We were both surprised and delighted the other evening with Thayer and Mrs. Hughes, in a "Day after the Wedding." Several pieces of this kind are produced at this house with much effect.

NEW MUSIC.

Since our last, Firth and Hall have published several new pieces of music, among which are six ballads, arranged in a familiar manner for the piano-forte, some of them with variations. These will be found agreeable assistants to the learner who has made some proficiency on the instrument. The titles are, the "Swiss Boy," Monro's celebrated "Sweet Jenny, the maid of the moor," Ollive's "Listen, ladies, listen," Meves's "Muleteer," Kirby's "They are all gone from the mountain home," and "Lieber Augustine." Printed on colored paper of various hues.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Our commonwealth.—We think we shall not subject ourselves to the imputation of vanity, nor be exposed to criticism, in assuming the position, that within the limits of the state of New-York are combined a greater number of natural advantages than are to be found in any other area of the same extent on the globe. Its dimensions, too, (forty-six thousand square miles) fall little short of some European kingdoms; and its position, in relation to this division of the earth, is most felicitous. In its figure it may not unaptly be compared to a majestic oak, standing on the margin of the vast Atlantic, its roots deeply and strongly imbedded, and spreading its magnificent branches even to the inland seas and rivers of the north and west. Not only is its soil eminently prolific, as is evinced in the immense amount of its rich and varied productions, and which in quantity and quality are not exceeded; but its general health and large population (now two millions) are unquestionable evidences of the salubrity of its climate. Its topographical features are singularly imposing. The majesty of its rivers, and the expanse of its waters; its noble cataracts; its extensive plains and valleys; the "lonely grandeur and chaotic beauty" of some of its lofty mountains, when taken collectively, are but in few instances surpassed.

In the amplitude and grandeur of our policy, as respects internal improvements, (those perennial fountains of wealth) we have left every other member of the confederacy as far behind us as we exceed the rest in numbers. Our canals, turnpikes, and rail-roads are of such extent and utility, that those who were once most sceptical concerning them, have become their zealous advocates; and the revolution of a few years will be sufficient to enable us to derive from them a revenue that will not merely be adequate to all the exigencies of government, but to authorize such an extension of the system, as will confer upon the most distant angle of the commonwealth, the cheapest possible modes of transportation.

Our commercial emporium, now comprising a population of considerably more than two hundred thousand souls, and fast rising in the scale of wealth and magnificence, is becoming as much an object of pride to its citizens, as it is of admiration to strangers. Its commerce increases in a ratio that places it altogether beyond the reach of example. And if it is now second to one or two others only of Europe, we believe that before the lapse of half a century, it will, on the score of commerce, take precedence of any other.

A persevering and commendable spirit is every where visible in multiplying those accommodations and comforts so acceptable to visitors and travellers. And since we have such constant influx from almost every portion of the Union, as well as from Europe and the West Indies, the wisdom of the policy is very manifest. Our public hotels and boarding houses are very numerous, and in the highest degree respectable. The epicure may here indulge himself to the extent of his desires. The tables are not merely spread with a rich profusion of solid food, but are garnished with delicacies from every clime. Nor is this by any means confined to the metropolis. The interior towns are not behind in their efforts to increase their reputation, and secure custom. Some travellers have said, that in a few instances they even excel those of long established character in the city. This seems extraordinary, inasmuch as it may appear too great a tax on ingenuity and skill, and incur such burdensome expenses as would defeat the objects of the undertaker. Nevertheless, we cannot withhold the expression of our wish, that such liberal expenditures and generous enterprise may meet with a corresponding reward.

The citizens of every part of our state look with lively solicitude to the annual visits of our southern neighbors. Of all guests, they are among the most welcome. Their liberality, their refinement, their intelligence, their known hospitality, will for ever make them acceptable. There is yet no impediment to this desirable and valuable intercourse; and while those of our citizens who have leisure and means to travel, may derive much pleasure from a visit to the south during the winter, they, on the contrary, will find it equally agreeable to escape from the heat of their summers, by an excursion to the northern places of fashionable resort.

Fright.—Although the custom of frightening children into obedience is, we trust, in a great measure banished from intelligent families, it is yet of too frequent occurrence. No system of government could be pursued more pernicious. All the experience of age, all the efforts of reason, cannot, in many instances, eradicate the fatal impressions of terror on the youthful mind. The United States Gazette mentions a case, which lately took place in Philadelphia, of more than ordinary interest. A little boy, named Isaacs, had been employed in the theatre, where a Mr. Wilkins, who was rather intoxicated, undertook to frighten him; for which purpose he produced a rope, which he said was the one used to hang Porter. He also exhibited an old coffin, shook at the lad some skull bones, and committed other indecent fooleries, until he became so frightened that he fell into violent fits. The master of the child entered a complaint before Alderman Binns, who, after hearing the case, held the accused to bail. It was soon after made known to the magistrate that the boy was dead!

Artificial eyes.—The idea of imitating the most beautiful of all nature's creation, so accurately as to render it nearly impossible to detect the deception, would have been considered a short time ago, utterly absurd; and although Dr. Scudder has been perfectly successful in the attempt, he informs us that there are people even yet incredulous. They do not believe their own eyes nor the Doctor's either. We confess that we also have had doubts upon the subject, until satisfied by ocular demonstration, and compelled to acknowledge that his skill is extraordinary and unparalleled. He brought one of his patients into our office the other day, and, according to his custom, challenged us to distinguish the natural eye from that of his own manufacture, which we were scarcely able to do. There is no pain in the operation of setting the ball in the socket, and the gentleman whose misfortune had been, at least in appearance, so unexpectedly remedied, assured us that he never suffered from it the slightest inconvenience, although he had worn it for more than two years.

Improvement in type metal.—We have before us the detached sheet of a work, from the press of Mr. James Conner, of this city, and intended as a specimen of printing types. The impression is uncommonly distinct and clear, the face of the letters being also much lighter than usual. In passing accidentally through the spacious type and stereotype foundry of this publisher, we were struck with the peculiar color of the metal, and were informed that it arose from the introduction of copper, in addition to the antimony, lead, and tin, of which the type has been generally composed. This, although understood by the founders in Boston and Albany, has never before been successfully attempted in this city. Mr. Conner, the sole individual, as we learn, whose experiments here have not failed, has not only discovered the secret, but improved upon it very materially, by the admixture of another ingredient, which he is unwilling to disclose, and by which the type becomes much lighter, harder, and more durable.

The Southern Review.—This journal, which, although supported by some of the most able writers and eminent men of the south, was discontinued for want of sufficient encouragement, has lately re-appeared. In the new number Mr. Bulwer's Siamese Twins is severely criticized.

American Quarterly Review.—All the contents of the eighteenth number of the American Quarterly Review have been given to the press, and it will be issued at the regular period. The titles of the several articles are, "College Instruction and Discipline," "Croly's George the Fourth," "Hieroglyphic System," "Iron," "Siamese Twins," "Europe and America," "Webster's Speeches and Forensic Arguments," "Poland," "History of Maryland," "Peale's Notes on Italy."

Mr. Graham.—The friends of this unfortunate poet, have called a meeting, for the purpose of adopting measures to relieve his necessities, as he is destitute of sight and of every method of obtaining support. He has occasionally written verses of much merit. Would it not be a more judicious and efficacious method of bringing him before the public, to print these pieces in a neat form, with the first proceeds of the subscription? It is probable that an extensive edition would, under these circumstances, command a ready sale.

New papers.—A morning journal, entitled the Daily Freeman's Advocate, and printed neatly on a large imperial sheet, has been recently established in Albany. Its editorial department is under the charge of Mr. E. V. Sparhawk, a gentleman fully competent to conduct the concerns of a paper with success. The New-York Whig has also lately appeared in this city, edited by Mr. Orville H. Holley, lately of the Troy Sentinel, and by Mr. Henry Dana Ward, both known as ready writers.

The Annuals.—A late English journal says, that the annuals have not flourished this season: "proprietors, publishers, sellers, and buyers, all unite in the same complaint. We were going to say, we did not regret the intelligence—they have not done much good for art, and we know they have done very little for literature. The engravers have been crammed with subjects that must be ready to a day, to the exclusion of works of higher claims; and, we believe, they would rejoice at the reign of steel being on the brink of a revolution. Landscape Annuals are, however, yet in vogue, and the rival productions of Standfield and Harding are giving busy note of preparation."

New Animal.—At a meeting of the London Eclectic society, a Dr. Johnson read a paper on the planaria torva, an insect something like the leech, of about half an inch in length. On decapitating this curious creature, new heads form in a few days.

Excessive love!—A Miss Susan Coster has been tried in the state of Alabama, for firing a pistol at a false lover, as he was escorting another fair one to church. She was acquitted on the ground that there was no malice, but on the contrary, an excess of love!

Waltzing.—A young gentleman, who was waltzing on Monday evening, became suddenly faint, called for a glass of water and died immediately. It is supposed that the violence of the evolutions occasioned the rupture of a bloodvessel near the heart.

WHY COMES HE NOT?

WRITTEN BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY—COMPOSED BY CHARLES E. HORN.

Andante.

Why comes he not? Why comes he not, Oh! sis-ter, can you say? My boy and I have watch'd the path To-ge-ther all the day; I'm jeal-ous of the ea-ger child, I fain would be a-lone: That his first com-ing may be seen By no eye save my own; By no eye save my own; By no eye save my own.

2d—He comes—'tis he! I hear his steed.
Ah, would he were in sight.
You think I am deceived? But hark,
You hear him—I was right.

Fool that I was—had I gone forth,
Beyond that shadowy grove,
I might already have beheld
The form of him I love.

3d—He darts like lightning from the trees;
He waves his hand aloft:
Again I hear those words of love,
That I have heard so oft.

I envy not the dame whose lord
Is never forced to roam;
She never knew the boundless joy
Of such a welcome home!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

LIBERAL PROFESSIONS.—A country fellow hearing the law called one of the liberal professions, employed three lawyers in a suit he had. He gained his cause, but the counsel fees were more than the sum recovered. "By zounds!" said he, "but this is the most curious liberal profession I ever heard of; in our part of the country we should be apt to call this mercenary."

GOOD NATURE.—It was said of a good-natured fellow, that he was as apt to forgive injuries as most people are to forget benefits.

THE SIX PLAGUES.—Sorbiere says that the six plagues of a small town are—a lawyer with great knowledge, great sophistry, and no sense of justice; an eminent physician with little skill or manners; a preacher without any conscience; a quarrelsome soldier; a politician without principles; and a man of letters who eternally dogmatizes.

AGREEMENT OF OPINION.—Men naturally associate with those who agree with them in opinion. This agreement not only flatters their self-love, but relieves them from the task of defending their tenets, which very often is no easy matter.

THE CENTRE.—Wherever a man is, that is the centre of the world to him.

DESCRIPTION AND DEFINITION.—To describe a thing is comparatively easy; but to give a definition of it, is a work of difficulty, and requires great clearness of comprehension as well as of language.

ORIGINALITY.—It is much more difficult to make a thing from the beginning, than to make great additions to it afterwards.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR:

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1881.

NUMBER 47.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—I enclose you several stanzas from the pen of Kashprashad Ghosh, a Hindoo of Calcutta. Although of great poetic merit, they have never been published in this country. Few are aware of the high intellectual attainments which characterize many Hindoo gentlemen. They possess a curious facility in expressing their conceptions with much purity and elegance in the English language, of which the following verses may be considered a fair specimen:

THE BOATMEN'S SONG TO GANGA.

Gold river! gold river! how gallantly now
Our bark on thy bright breast is lifting her prow.
In the pride of her beauty, how swiftly she flies:
Like a white-winged spirit through topaz-paved skies.

Gold river! gold river! thy bosom is calm,
And o'er thee the breezes are shedding their balm;
And nature beholds her fair features portrayed,
In the glass of thy bosom serenely displayed.

Gold river! gold river! the sun to thy waves
Is fleeing to rest in thy cool coral caves;
And thence, with his tiar of light, at the morn
He will rise, and the skies with his glory adorn.

Gold river! gold river! how fair is the beam,
Which brightens and crimson thy soft flowing stream;
Whose waters beneath make a musical dashing,
Whose ripples like dimples in childhood are flashing.

Gold river! gold river! the moon will soon grace
The hall of the stars with her light-shedding face;
The wandering planets her palace will throng,
And seraphs will waken their music and song.

Gold river! gold river! our brief course is done,
And safe in the city our home we have won;
And now, as the bright sun who drops from our view,
So, Ganga, we bid thee a cheerful adieu!

ORIGINAL TALES.

RANDOM SKETCHES.—THE PIRATE.

It was soon known through the little village of Henriton that Tom Beach had returned from sea; and it was soon rumored, through the jealousy of an old enemy, the attorney, that more gold jingled in his purse than had been put there honestly. He was a fine-looking fellow; free, daring, and as liberal with his money as a prince; but his good character had never before been attacked, and all these vague suspicions were soon silenced. People could only guess and imagine, and it was hard that a man should be ruined by guesses and fancies; and so it all died away, and Tom was a clever fellow again. He married a lovely girl, established her in a pleasant house, and was soon once more on the waters.

His absence continued for three years. He left the vessel in which he had shipped, at the first port she touched, and nothing was afterwards heard from him till his arrival home. Where he had been, what he had been about, and all the accompanying et cetera, were left entirely unexplained.

"I'll tell ye what," said Farmer Stevens, as he knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and looked wise, "I'll tell you what, I more than suspect that young Master Beach is an older one than we think for. It isn't honest people that do what they have to do in the dark. Eggs and spinnage! to be sure, nobody knows what he has been about, and yet he has oceans of cash."

The Hon. Asahel Smith, who was representative from Henriton, and occupied all the offices of the town, was occasionally accustomed, for the sake of preserving his popularity, to take a glass of beer and a cigar with the assembled politicians at the sign of the golden ball. He happened to be there at the time Farmer Stevens let fall the above remark. His constituents looked at Asahel; Asahel looked at his constituents. There was a dead silence, and the representative, who did not like to commit himself, shook his head solemnly, put on his broad-brimmed hat, and quietly walked away.

"I knew there was something in it; and 'squire knows more about it than he is willing to tell. He acts with statesman-like prudence," rejoined Farmer Stephens.

"Something in it! I guess there is a good deal in it," added the multitude; if we can be allowed to class four honorables and five esquires under so promiscuous a title."

The golden ball was soon deserted, and all its temporary occupants ran home as rapidly as they conveniently could, to inform their wives and families, as a great secret, and in as confidential a manner as possible, that the Honorable Asahel Smith knew more about Captain Beach than he was willing to tell.

"I had it from his own mouth," said Farmer Stevens: "it was publicly mentioned; but I don't wish anything said about it as coming from me. It may not be true after all, and then it would get the young man into difficulty."

Mrs. Beach was a beautiful woman, and the young couple were really the only people in their native village who had made any considerable advances in civilization. They lived in a very pretty way, and I have drank a good glass of wine at their table. It was a sad thing to me that these rumors or suspicions, or rather these shadows of suspicions, should get about, for I did not know what they might lead to. They were, of course, entirely unfounded. Captain Beach was a daring, enterprising man, and had followed up some branch of business with extraordinary success—and this was the amount of it. That he should have been guilty of any fraud, or engaged in any contraband or illegal trade, was altogether out of the question.

Mrs. Andrews gave a large tea-party. It was a delightful afternoon, and we stepped in just as they had got to their toast and tea—to say nothing of pie and apple-sauce. The company were all dallying with their forks or spoons, as if they were thinking about anything but the toast, and the pleasant beverage that Queen Anne used to "take" so many years ago. There was something weighing upon the guests, which no one could be prevailed upon to touch first.

"What a dreadful thing," commenced Miss Babcock.

"Very dreadful!" simultaneously groaned the company.

"What a dreadful thing it was," she continued innocently, "that there should have been so many lives lost at that great fire in New-York."

"That is not what you referred to, Mrs. Smith, is it?"

"Certainly not," said Mrs. Smith, placing her cup emphatically upon the waiter, and putting her cap a little back from her prominent forehead; "I was thinking what a dreadful thing it was for poor Mrs. Beach."

"So was I," exclaimed several voices, in various tones and semi-tones of horror and compassion.

"Why," observed Miss Simplicity Sweetbriar, "did she lose any friends at the fire?"

"How, then," said Mrs. Andrews, "is it possible that you have not heard? I thought everybody knew all the particulars."

"Particulars of what?" rejoined the amiable Misses Babcock and Sweetbriar.

"Mary, you may leave the room," said Mrs. Andrews. Mary left the room very obediently, and placed her ear at the keyhole.

"If I may not see, I suppose I may hear," soliloquized the submissive domestic.

"You must know, then," began Mrs. Andrews, "that this is not a new thing. They have had suspicions of Tom Beach these ten years. The select men have had their eye on him ever since Deacon Bronson whipped him for stealing his cherries to give them to that poor lame boy he used to go to see so much. Then he was hardly three feet high. 'Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.' You remember how we used to read it at school—and I'm much of that man's mind."

"What man was that?" interrogated Miss Sweetbriar.

"It was an observation of the pope's—and a sensible pope too. Well, as I was saying, this is not a new thing, though it was never thought he was half so bad. But, before I begin, I will just mention that you will be kind enough not to repeat this after me, as I have no wish to say anything against him, and so should not like to be brought into any difficulty. 'Twas told me that 'Squire Smith stated it as a thing he had good reason to suspect, that there were very bad suspicions afloat respecting Captain Beach?' And then Mrs. Andrews rolled up her eyes, with a mingled expression of sorrow and admiration.

"I knew," said Mrs. Stevens, "when those splendid silks and satins came home, that everything was not going on as it ought to. I said nothing—but who once thought it would come to this?" And the conclave broke up, lamenting that Captain Beach should have turned out a—pirate! Miss Sweetbriar retired to her chamber, and dreamed that being on board a packet-ship, bound to London, the vessel was attacked by pirates, and every mariner and passenger except herself massacred; that she escaped by means of her piteous shrieks, and the fact was, that one of the wretches, who knew her perfectly, and called her by name, turned out to be—her own waiting-maid, standing by her bedside, and vociferating, in no gentle language, that if she "did not get up pretty quick she would have a cold breakfast." Mrs. Andrews sat up till most morning, talking it over with her spouse. The Honorable Asahel Smith, on the motion of Mrs. Smith, thought it a "subject proper to be submitted to judicial investigation."

"Mary," said Captain Beach one day after dinner, "Mary, my love, where is that switch with the ivory head I brought home with me the other afternoon?" for he had heard the rumors in circulation, and traced them to their author. His wife sent for the switch, and he repaid her trouble by a kiss. "This will hardly answer," thought he, looking at its slender proportions, and taking up his walk rapidly towards a shop, where he knew they could provide him with a more suitable instrument.

"This is the article I am looking for," quoth the captain, as he opened his purse to pay for it.

One can hardly wonder that he was taken for a pirate, when he indulged the extravagance of settling his purchases by cash. He tried the article once or twice across his boot. It was what in vulgar parlance is called a cow-hide.

He knocked at the door of a large house in the centre of the village. A brawny lass opened it at the knock, and told him that 'Squire Smith would speak with him in a few minutes; he was busy just then with a client. "Tell him there is a gentleman waiting to speak with him immediately. Oh, good day, Mr. Smith. I have a little business to transact, and if you will be kind enough to walk down with me as far as the golden ball, I shall be your very humble servant."

"Certainly, Captain Beach, certainly, sir, with a great deal of pleasure;" and they walked along, arm in arm, to the sign of the golden ball. It was a pleasant afternoon, and as several political matters were at this time agitating the community, there was a great number of illustrious personages collected about the door of the tavern.

"Now, sir," said Captain B., "I intend taking the law into my own hands, and to punish your manifold transgressions. I am going to whip you, and leave you to guess what it is for. So take off your jacket, and bear it as well as you can."

The Honorable Asahel Smith stood aghast. His constituents looked in wonder; but they offered him no assistance, and he was obliged to submit to the indignity of corporeal punishment.

"Sir," said Asahel, "I shall prosecute you and recover at the next term, and am certain to recover."

"Oh, sir," retorted the captain, "I intend to beat you beyond all chance of recovery."

This was the only proof that my friend ever condescended to bring forward to clear up his character. All rumors were speedily dissipated. The next year he succeeded the Honorable Asahel in his seat in the state legislature, and has since represented his native county in congress.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN.—In looking over the late numbers of your miscellany, I was much amused by a sketch delineating, with a great deal of truth, the dangers and disadvantages of attempting to read aloud to ladies. Your correspondent seems to have taken the picture fresh from life, as many a rash male individual can testify; but, if he possesses the same sensibility in respect to music which he feels on the subject of the belles-lettres, he might have added another chapter to his narrative of domestic troubles. I allude to the rude conduct of certain people, who pretend to be fond of music, but, whether in the theatre, the drawing-room, or in private societies, who make no ceremony of offering any impertinent interruption to the efforts of others to play or sing. It is getting to be quite fashionable for us to congratulate ourselves upon our refined taste for, and wonderful improvement in the art. Yet, however assiduously it may have been cultivated, and with whatever visible satisfaction we may sound our own praise, I must take the liberty of observing, that there are many loud boasters among us untouched with the real inspiration, and whose actions convince me that, if the matter could be accurately ascertained, it would be discovered, notwithstanding their pretended raptures, that they would rather employ themselves in discussing syllabubs, creams, pickled oysters, and similar dainties, than in listening to the happiest productions of the best masters. For my own part, with whatever zest I might endeavor to amuse my family, if circumstances permitted, fate has, alas! denied me both wife and sisters. My appearance is rather odd, not to say ugly—and I am not versed in the little graceful artifices which seem necessary to conciliate female affections. I have, therefore, brought down my once ardent hopes to a philosophical resignation to live and die a lonely, reckless, unloving, and unloved old bachelor. Well, no matter. So much the smaller chasm shall I leave in society, when the sure but awful tyrant grasps me with his icy fingers, and drags me away even from the few amusements with which I now strive to cheer the solitude of my situation. Among these my love of music offers one, both innocent and delightful. I believe it is almost the only feeling which has remained faithful to me among all the fresh and simple sources of pleasure which open around the path of boyhood. You may have already detected me for one of that kind of grave persons whom sentimental young ladies term melancholy men, whispering to each other that they have been disappointed in some early passion, but whom your good-humored, fat, contented people declare hipped. Whatever may be the cause of my general gravity and taciturnity, nothing unbends me—or as some of my merry friends express it—unstarches me like music. It breaks in upon my shadowy contemplations as the sun disperses the vapors of the night, pencils the fair vault of heaven with streaks of radiance, and brightens all nature with cheerfulness. My eyes are moistened—the sluggish blood dances through my veins—and pleasure darts through my whole system.

You, gentlemen, may think this rhodomontade; but I describe my sensations not from vanity, for I write anonymously, but in order to make you more clearly comprehend the justice of my complaints against those who break so agreeable a spell by rude violations of good manners.

I would particularly call the attention of really well-bred persons to that class of intruders who infest the theatres. They are not confined to the low and uneducated; but, strange as it certainly is, they are frequently discovered in what is called the best society. While the most vulgar bring nuts and apples in their pockets to help them through an opera, others render themselves equally conspicuous and disagreeable by ill-timed laughter and loud conversation. I was, the other evening, accidentally entrapped into a consent to accompany a party of these good-natured pretenders to taste to hear the famous opera of Cinderella; but before the entertainments were half over, I inwardly vowed that no snare should ever again be sufficiently strong to catch me in such an awkward and unpleasant dilemma. There was continually going on a quantity of small talk, which not only proved the individuals themselves utterly incapable of appreciating the fine compositions of Rossini, but annoyed all our neighbors. While Mr. Jones was singing "Music floats in the air," with a sweetness which has never been surpassed before an American public, one young miss asked me if I did not think the bird trimming his feathers on the rock bore a strong resemblance to a goose. The brother stretched his head over my shoulder and declared that she was a goose for asking such a question; which ordinary and appropriate display of wit was conveyed, in a loud whisper, from one to another and raised a laugh in each. I hold a pun in all cases to be execrable; but just at that moment—I am ashamed to confess how my temper was ruffled. Mr. Thorne, who is an especial favorite of mine, both as a player and a vocalist—delighted me in the chorus, "But soft, behold—o'ercome by sleep;" yet, in the sweetest part, a discussion, which had been for some time carried on in brisk whispers between two of the gentlemen, upon the almost forgotten subject of the Calhoun correspondence, now rose to a more audible pitch, and one of the political amateurs destroyed the whole effect of the music by asking me if I did not think "Mr. Calhoun had knocked Mr. Jackson all to sticers?" I therefore resolved to enjoy the future representations of this opera in the pit, where I accordingly one evening took my seat, unaccompanied by any friend whose importunities could disturb my enjoyment. But I found, as is usually the case with us poor, short-sighted mortals, in our vain attempts to improve our situation, that I had only substituted one species of evil for another; for, in the finest part of the prince's recitative, a man behind touched me on the head with the end of his cane, and inquired with great politeness, if I "used tobacco?" adding the very interesting information that he had "become so much accustomed to the weed, that although he was afraid, indeed he was certain, it injured his nervous system, he found it impossible to leave it off." I looked down to be sure the wretch had not cloven feet, and then removed to a distant place, when, just as I was becoming again tranquilized with "Midst doubts confusing," a little, indolent, sleepy-looking amateur with monstrous whiskers, and a slender whalebone whip, lounging by my side, struck in and "volunteered his valuable services," as the play-bills have it, to assist Mrs. Austin through the most difficult passages, which he persevered in pertinaciously to the end, with as much apparent satisfaction on his own part, as vexation and even indignation on mine. Pray, gentlemen, is there no way of marking these disturbers of the peace—these intruders into genteel society, that people may know and avoid them?

You have not yet reached the end of my catalogue of complaints, for these annoyances are not confined to the theatre. My love of music lately induced me to become a member of a society which meet once a week for the purpose of improving themselves in the art. Here exist the same causes of dissatisfaction—the same visible carelessness respecting the object for which they assemble. During the execution of the various pieces, the performance is sure to be interrupted by a slamming of doors, a trampling and shuffling of feet, and creaking of boots, whispering and tittering, a scraping of fiddles, or a volunteer accompanying flourish from some of the spectators. These are the sort of admirers of the divine art who, at concerts, oratorios, &c. &c. rise towards the close of the last piece, button up their coats, draw on their gloves, and look about for their hats, leaving the performers to finish the finale to empty benches. To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—Will you permit me to introduce myself to you as a correspondent of your excellent miscellany? It is unnecessary for me to detail any circumstances of my personal history, as I do not intend ever to appear before your readers except under the disguise of a fictitious signature. In furnishing this communication I am not actuated by any literary vanity which I have long out-grown, but simply and purely because I desire to assist you in labors which I can easily imagine are as arduous as they are laudable; and if a few sketches from my pen will bestow any additional interest upon the "Mirror," I shall deem myself amply compensated.

There is in this city a club of gentlemen, consisting of six, who meet occasionally at each other's houses for the purpose of enjoying a few hours of social converse upon the passing events of the day. We are deadly foes to all kinds of intemperance, and our habitual abstemiousness imparts a more agreeable relish to the few glasses of excellent old wine which occasionally, indeed regularly, finds its way into our peaceful circle; it is also an established rule which I never knew violated in a single instance, either in or out of our sessions, by any member, to abhor and eschew the cigar, except the very best which money can procure from abroad. Those light, dry, mild, yellow, and spotted fellows, which burn into ashes white as snow, and leave a fragrance that overspreads the whole system with a sensation of peaceful benevolence and indolent pleasure. Our meetings are characterized by a sort of eastern luxuriance and voluptuous ease. We rarely fail to assemble the whole number, and whoever, in those quiet and rich hours of friendly enjoyment is found among the missing, we generally consider either dead, sick, or a fool. We are all so well advanced in life as to have a dignity unknown to youth—and yet are far distant from age—ripe and mellow—not decayed. Unmarried, of course. By the mysteries of Hecate! no husband gets among us to break the spell when the clock strikes ten, that his better half may be kept in a good humor. No—we are free as air, and just as happy as the summer sky is blue, or the autumn harvest rich and wavy. Most of us have travelled in Europe, and all been far from this little busy and boasting town. We follow our professions as men of sense, who know how much more delicious is absolute leisure after employment. But fortune has blest each of us with independence, health, and personal advantages, so that we pay for what we want like gentlemen—never trouble our heads about doctors and journals of health—and feel that when we accidentally cast our eyes under the dunstable of a pretty woman, the pleasure is (I speak without any affectation of modesty) mutual. We have just a good enough opinion of ourselves to make us always good humored and happy. Beshrew your sentimental, timid, philosophizing, modest varlets, who go through this world, which they have as much right to as any one in it, tremblingly and with down-cast eyes. We are dashing, reckless, laughter-loving blades, who believe ourselves six of the best, merriest, wittiest, most gentlemanly fellows that you could pick out of forty such cities as this of Manahatta.

You must not, however, suppose that we are merely lovers of mirth and laughter. No: we are observers of all the varied and shifting scenes which are for ever changing the aspect of human life. We look through "the loop-holes of retreat" upon the great jostle and struggle of the millions around us—and, however violently I have sometimes had my risible muscles exercised, I have often been equally delighted with displays of reason, and flashes of fancy—with vivid pictures of nature, and eloquent expositions of truth. To glean up the hitherto wasted treasures of intellect—to catch the flying opinions which here escape—and amuse the town with specimens of the conversations which here take place, warmed with friendship and wine, is the object which induced me to address you. We are all good and true subscribers to the Mirror; and the idea that we might be able to facilitate your exertions to render its pages attractive, struck me the other evening, in consequence of a pretty brisk dialogue carried on by two whom I shall veil under the dignity of antique cognomens.

"It is surprising to me," said Rhesus, as, placing his brimming glass before the light, he gazed a moment with one eye through its deep and transparent crimson, "it is surprising to me why the Americans have not made more progress in literary matters than seems yet to have attended their endeavors."

"It is surprising to me," added Solon, as he watched the indolent and graceful curl of the smoke, which wreathed itself in spiral lines, and vanished like a spirit, "how they have made any progress at all."

"Why, are there no authors here?" asked Rhesus.

"I may almost say," replied his companion, "that there are none. Not but that there are as many capable of conceiving and of expressing their conceptions as well as Scott, Byron, or Moore, but they are in the ore; and all literature is here in the ore. We live upon the English, and we bend to them without even following, without even attempting to follow, their example."

"But surely," observed Rhesus, "America has done wonders."

"She has commenced wonders, but she has accomplished nothing," said Solon. "She is like a youth of genius. Suppose he is a painter; he is then full of bright, glowing conceptions. He goes abroad to look on nature, and is enraptured with her majestic grandeur and sublimity, or her quiet and enchanting beauty. He seizes his pencil, and strives to embody his visions on the canvass; but, long before his efforts assume the shape of reality, he is fatigued with the application necessary to carry his wishes into effect. He flings aside his half-finished and neglected sketch, which, if completed, might have rendered him immortal, and hastens to some new subject, fresh with the charm of novelty, till, led astray by his wandering caprices in striving after every thing, he attains nothing. It is even thus with this nation. There is no deliberate system to encourage perseverance in candidates for literary renown. Her poets are, for a brief period, gratified with empty praise, and afterwards suffered to dwindle into insignificance; while the attempts made, in the form of periodical journals, are compelled to depend upon a taste as fickle as the wishes of a child."

"Perhaps," said Rhesus, "the fault lies in the journals themselves. Perhaps they are not so well conducted as to render them desirable."

"Your observation is shown to be incorrect," said Solon, "by the fact, that the patronage withdrawn from one is bestowed upon another of still more slender claims to distinction. In this particular I can liken the American people to nothing better than a flock of sheep—when one jumps over a fence, no one knows wherefore, the whole multitude follow his example, as if life and death depended on their speed, till, concluding that the place they have abandoned is better on comparison than they expected, some one commences the return, and they all jump back again. Hence periodical literature in this country is always unstable, always liable to be injured by quackery and charlatanism. The public themselves exercise very little judgment. They talk aloud of their love of country, their interest in its literary welfare, but never do anything with the view of promoting it. There is no concentrated effort on the part of a community to encourage a deserving work or to reward a meritorious author, unless the subject is brought before them in all the various forms of unabashed puffery. This cunning and contemptible conspiracy against the cause of literature, is always, for a time, successful; and when I have beheld sensible men and intelligent families all carried away by a column of disgusting praise, which probably proceeded from the pen of the very person whose great merit called it forth. I no longer wonder that the Americans have done, I may almost say, nothing, to distinguish themselves as a literary people. If they refuse to support the efforts of their writers, they never can obtain reputation, and they never deserve it. The rebukes of foreign critics are but merited consequences of their own negligence and apathy; and they will be served up with trash, which barefaced impudence palms off upon them as valuable matter, till the reviewing journals of the country are firmly enough established to criticize with bold justice, and until the nation shall yield them patronage sufficient to render them attractive to writers of character, education, and talents. GENTLEMEN—The following curious grant of lands will show with what little ceremony William the Conqueror despoiled the ancient possessors of the soil. It is extracted from the "National Portrait Gallery," now publishing in London.

"FRANCIS RAWDON HASTINGS, MARQUIS OF HASTINGS, K. G.

"The family of Hastings is of great antiquity, and of Norman extraction; but the English pedigree is deduced from Paulyn, or Paulinus de Roydon, who commanded a body of archers in the army of William, at the battle of Hastings. For this service he received from the Conqueror a grant of lands in the west riding of Yorkshire, near Leeds. The tenure was by grand serjeantry, and the condition that of presenting to the king and his successors a cross-bow and arrow, whenever any of them should come to hunt there. Of the title-deed, conveying these manorial rights, Weever, in his "Funeral Monuments," gives the following transcript:

"I William Kyng, the third yere o' my reign,
Give to thee Paulyn Roydon, Hope and Hoptowne,
With all the bounds both up and downe;
From heven to yertie, from yertie to hel,
For thee and thine there to dwell,
As truly as this king-right is myne;
For a crosse-bow and an arrow,
When I sal come to hunt on Yarrow.
And in token that this thing is sooth,
I bit the whyt wax with my tooth,
Before Meg, Maud, and Margery,
And my third sonne, Henry."

The armorial bearing is that of a fesse between three pheons, or arrow-heads, with this motto, Et nos quoque tela sparsimus. "We too have scattered our arrows."

THE FINE ARTS.

CONCERT OF SACRED MUSIC.

A FINE selection, from the old masters, was performed at the Paraclete church, in Vandewater-street, on Wednesday the eighteenth instant, and, as we omitted to notice a previous performance, held at the same place, we offer a few remarks on the present one. The following vocalists were announced:

MRS. AUSTIN, MR. GEAR,
MISS PEARSON, MR. PEARSON,

MESDAMES HUYLER, GOULD, AND SINGLETON,

And the choir under the direction of Mr. Cole.

And as instrumental performers,

MR. HILL, chef d'orchestre,
MR. J. TAYLOR, double bass,
MR. NORTON, trumpet,
MR. SCHOTT, clarinet.

Many other musicians of talent afforded their aid to the choir of the church, for whose benefit the concert took place; but as their names did not appear in the bills, we do not conceive that we have a right to record them here. The selections were from Handel's "Messiah," with the additional orchestral accompaniments by Mozart, a chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and a song and chorus from Haydn's "Creation." Before we proceed to criticize, we may be allowed to make a few observations on the bill, which announced, for the first time in New-York, the orchestral parts that furnish such a commentary on Mozart's respect for the talents of Handel. No musician can scrutinize the score of the "Messiah," with Mozart's additions, without feeling that he was sincere in his declaration that "Handel knows best of all of us what is capable of producing a great effect. When he chooses, he strikes like a thunderbolt." With no effect of Handel has Mozart interfered; in no way has he changed even the inversion of a chord. He has merely added the instruments which were either unknown or imperfect in Handel's day. The overture is a striking specimen of his delicacy in this respect: to the slow movement only has he given wind-instruments. The regular and beautiful fugue remains in its primitive state. The only innovation that Mozart has made, is found in that fine bass song, "The trumpet shall sound," which he has arranged with wind instruments, removing the trumpet, and substituting a D horn in its place; at the same time he furnishes a trumpet part of minor import. We must add, however, that he gives, on the opposite page, Handel's version of the song, filled up with wind instruments, as in the rest of the score. In the former arrangement, we conceive that Mozart has merely placed the corni in the place of the tromba, in order to meet the capability of most bands, for any tolerable horn player can master the obligato passages, whereas it requires first-rate ability in the professor of the trumpet to do them justice. As in the "Bright Seraphim," the trumpet part not only ascends to B, or rather A on the D trumpet, but that note is sustained, and divisions are run on the top of the scale, thereby requiring a union of art and physical power, seldom united in the person of one man. We are inclined to imagine that the above considerations alone urged Mozart to offer such an arrangement, because a perusal of the words will point out the necessity of preferring the trumpet to the horn. The overture was exceedingly ill played; the second violin was inaudible in the fugue, and instead of taking up the many leads with which it abounds, failed in nearly the whole; the first violins alone replied to the basses and tenors, consequently the effect was destroyed. "Comfort ye my people" followed, by Mr. Gear. We can always compliment this gentleman for strict propriety and good emphasis; and as a teacher of vocalism, he is a great acquisition to any city. The chorus, "The glory of the Lord," succeeded, and was sung correctly and with force. The choir seemed strong in bass and soprano voices. Haydn's beautiful descriptive song, "On mighty pens," (from the first four bars of which, by the way, Mr. Bishop has stolen the subject of his song, "Lo, here the gentle lark,") came next in order, and gave Mrs. Austin an opportunity of proving her perfect knowledge of this master—we wish we could say the same of the band. The flute played the notes but not the author; and strange to say, Mr. Schott failed in the obligato leads for the clarinet; however, the steadiness of the double bass and violins patched up the affair. This song, the most difficult soprano morceau in the oratorio, describes the creation of birds—the flight of the eagle, the soaring gaiety of the lark, the cooing of doves, and the plaintive warblings of the nightingale alternately, are expressed by the vocalist, with imitations by the wind instruments. Horns, flutes, bassoons, in turn, are called in to aid a most glowing description, by their several qualities; and the absence of one of these instruments, or its failure, was a serious loss. We have heard the concerto at St. Paul's church in London. Once at Boston, accompanied by the band of the Tremont theatre, (then excellent) and sung by Mrs. Austin, at the rooms of the Handel and Haydn society. The effect produced was charming, and will be remembered by the members of that society and every one present. And twice in New-York—once by Miss Gillingham at St. Paul's, when the accompaniment was execrable, and lastly by Mrs. Austin as we have described. Miss Pearson essayed the song, "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" but this young lady, and a Miss Gould, who attempted Handel's "Farewell, ye limpid streams," must permit us to remark, that, although their voices are both good, yet they have not that cultivation which is necessary for principal singers. In concerted music they may, by dint of good quality, and intonation of voice, appear to advantage. In songs, at present, they both manifest the want of a master. The trio "How beautiful appears," from the "Creation," is a proof of our assertion. It was sung very effectively by Miss Pearson, Mr. Gear, and Mr. Pearson. Two ladies also, named Huyler, sang a duet very tolerably. The chorus, "Hallelujah," from the "Mount of Olives," was executed well. The "Angels ever bright and fair," is too recently in our readers recollection to require comment; suffice it to say, that both this song, and "Let the bright Seraphim," gained additional effect from the beautiful formation of the church for sound, in which respect it is superior to any place of worship we have yet visited. The grand "Hallelujah," by Handel, was admirably sung as a finale. Majestic in simplicity, and soaring above all composers in grandeur of idea, who can object to the name of the "Briars of music," as applied to him by Pope; and who will dispute Haydn's reflection, that "this man is the father of us all?"

ENGRAVING.

Bourne's views of New-York are nearly completed. They are drawn by Burton, and the engravers are Smilie, Archer, Fossette, and Gimber. They are uncommonly accurate, and those by Smilie are finished with great delicacy and skill.—Nine plates are already published, each containing two of the following views: St. Paul's church; Merchants' Exchange, Wall-street; Council chamber, City-hall; Public room, Merchants' Exchange; Bowling-green; Landing place, foot of Courtland-street; Masonic-hall; Landing place, foot of Barclay-street; St. Thomas's church, Broadway; Park theatre, and part of Park row; Bowery theatre; Washington-hotel; Junction of Broadway and the Bowery; Bay and harbor of New-York; Steam-boat wharf, Battery-place; Mansion house, Bunker's, Broadway; Park-place; American-hotel.

NEW MUSIC.

Bourne continues to afford new evidences of his industry, taste, and enterprise. He overflows us with musical pieces,

"Like the waves of the summer, as one dies away, Another, as bright, and as shining, comes on."

We have now before us the comic song of "Ye tormentors," as sung by Mr. Placide in Cinderella, and also a fine piece of twenty-seven pages, entitled "Variations brillantes for the piano-forte, on the favorite air Ma Fanchette est charmante, as performed by Miss Sterling and a distinguished amateur." In elegance of execution, as well as the character of the music, these deserve the attention of every friend of the art.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE WIDOWED IVY.

AN ivy tree, with its constant green leaves, crept along the ground with difficulty, and looked round for a tree against which to twist itself; for it was much grieved that its leaves were eaten by the caterpillars and worms, and their shining green defiled by the dust. He saw a tall young elm tree, crept to its roots, and besought it thus:—"Fair tree! permit me the favor to wind my branches round your stem. I cannot, certainly, be of any use to you; yet I can, at least, furnish you with some ornament. When your leaves, and those of other trees, are long faded and fallen to the earth, mine shall still twine around you, and make you verdant, and you will appear lovelier than your brethren."

The elm-tree answered: "I yield to your request; not out of consideration for the advantages you promise, but on account of your weakness and tenderness. You do not deserve to have your leaves eaten by caterpillars and worms, or trodden down by animals."

Thus spoke the elm-tree; and the ivy twisted its branches round about it, and gratefully embraced it with its green leaves. They grew united, and rejoiced in their youth and life; they drank the dew of heaven, enjoyed the invigorating rays of the sun, and were loved and admired by all who loved any thing. But when the autumn came, the leaves of the elm-tree began to turn yellow and red, withered, and fell off; the tree lamented and was melancholy, and said to its younger friend: "The winter is severe and hard; I have seen several of my brothers perish in the cold stormy winds; and when the spring came, they could not again adorn themselves with fresh leaves, for their sap was dried up. Ah! if such a fate should be mine, my bond of friendship with you will be broken."

The ivy tried to console it, and said: "In death also I will still as faithfully embrace you as I do now that you are young and handsome; and I will never separate from the protecting stem that so benevolently supported me."

But once there was a very severe winter: the shores of the Baltic were frozen, the rivers became masses of ice, the whole land was covered with snow, and the frost penetrated to the hearts of the trees, and deep into the earth; the birds flew anxiously backwards and forwards, and sought a warmer spot to protect them from the intense cold. The ivy said: "What will become of the good elm-tree? Oh! if it do but escape destruction by the frost!"

Finally came the spring: crocuses, violets, snow-drops, and other early flowers, courageously raised their little crowns above the earth, and peeped up, as if it were already warm; the birch-tree waved its green branches in the air; and the apple and cherry trees had already formed their blossoms: but the branches of the elm-tree stood bare, neither bud nor green leaf sprouted from it. Then the ivy lamented, and said: "Ah! he is dead, my faithful protector, my tender friend; and I cannot rejoice in the sweet spring, for I am solitary and deserted!"

The other trees now said to the mourner: "Why do you remain clinging to the dead elm-tree? Unwind yourself from the stem, and come to us, who are yet fresh and green!"

The ivy answered: "Far be it from me to reward the benevolence of the deceased tree with such base ingratitude! Have not my leaves affectionately embraced him during his life? so shall they in death also; and hang around him as a garland of gratitude and grief."

Thus spoke the ivy, and its leaves adorned the beloved stem even in death.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.

THERE are two extremes, equally dangerous, to be avoided in the education of children. Some parents deem it necessary to watch over and control their every action, and almost their every thought; to punish, with severity, every infringement upon established rules, and to exact from them, on all occasions, the most implicit obedience and respect. Others entertain very opposite opinions concerning the mode of treatment most favorable to the development of the affections and the understanding. They suppose that restraint interferes with the free growth of the mind; that the character when left entirely to itself, will spring up into more vigorous strength, like a tree in a forest, which demands no cultivation. As in most cases, truth lies in the medium. The strict discipline, exercised by some over their offspring, is much to be deprecated. It injures the natural courage and openness of the disposition, and destroys the free operation of the reason. A child, whose ears are continually fatigued with rebuke and admonition, will at length detest instruction, and the individual by whom it is communicated. There should always be a certain degree of independence about its person. It should not be taught to look with too great fear and reliance upon any one. A perfect and uniform correctness of deportment can only be properly obtained from a long course of careful education, unattended with passion and violence. The first object should be to gain the affections without forfeiting the respect, and then example, which the child cannot fail to observe, will influence it more than a thousand precepts, especially in the habits requisite to pass through the daily routine of life with propriety.

But the contrary extreme is equally pernicious. To abandon restraint altogether, besides rendering the child a nuisance to others, will produce very unpleasant consequences in after life to itself. Such wants and wishes as result from ignorance and caprice, should be promptly refused, and the refusal never disregarded. If possible, the cause should be explained. If it is beyond their comprehension, they should be so informed, and any display of temper should be invariably met with calm but firm displeasure. To hush up their passion, by at length acceding to their desires once opposed, is so obviously improper, and so clearly confirms them in obstinacy and unreasonable demands, that it is extraordinary how any intelligent mother can fall into the error.

There is in the memoirs of the Countess de Genlis a picture of the results of this kind of indulgence, so illustrative of my meaning, and so apt to the present subject, that the reader will pardon me for inserting it:

"Madame d'Estourmelles, then fifty-seven, had an only son, five years old. The Isaac of this modern Sarah, was, of all spoiled children, the most insufferable I ever met with. Every thing was permitted him; nothing was refused him: he was the absolute master of the drawing room and of the château. M. Emmanuel de Boufflers is the only instance I have since seen to recall to me this singular kind of education. I arrived at Frétoy two hours after dinner: there was a large party from Paris. I had a cottage bonnet, as it was then styled; it was quite new, covered with beautiful flowers, and fastened on the left side of the head with a great many pins. I was scarcely seated, when the terrible tyrant of the château came and snatched out of my hand a superb fan, and broke it in Madame d'Estourmelles gave her son a slight reprimand for having broken my fan, but for not having asked me for it politely. An instant after, the child went and whispered to his mother that he wanted my bonnet. 'Very well, my child,' replied Madame d'Estourmelles, gravely, 'go and ask for it very politely.' He immediately ran up to me crying, 'I want your bonnet.' He was told that he must not say 'I want,' and this was what his mother called 'passing over none of his faults.' She then dictated to him his formula of demand; 'Madame, will you have the goodness to lend me your bonnet?' Every one in the room cried out against this fancy, but the mother and son persisted. M. de Genlis ridiculed it with some bitterness, and I saw that Madame d'Estourmelles was about to get angry; I then rose up, and generously sacrificing my pretty bonnet, I went and begged Madame d'Estourmelles to unpin it, which she did in great haste, for the child began to get very violent and impatient. Madame d'Estourmelles embraced me, and praised excessively my mildness, my complaisance, and my fine hair. She insisted that I looked a hundred times better without my bonnet, though my curls were all deranged, and I made a very ridiculous figure in full dress, with my hair in disorder. My hat was delivered to the child, on condition of his not spoiling it. But in less than ten minutes the bonnet was torn, crushed, and rendered unfit ever to be worn again. I took care, afterwards, to dress my hair simply, and to wear neither bonnet nor flowers. But, unfortunately, this spoiled child was grateful for what I had done; he attached himself to me with unmeasured violence, and refused to quit my side; as soon as I entered the room, he would place himself on my knees; he was very fat and heavy, and not only fatigued me unmercifully, but crumpled my gowns, and even tore them by placing upon them loads of playthings. I could neither speak to any one, nor hear a syllable of any kind of conversation; and it was even impossible for me to get rid of him so long as to play a game at chess. In all my little journeys I carried my harp with me; but here, if any one wished to hear me play, it was impossible, while I sat at the harp, to prevent the child (who kept continually near it) from playing also on the bass strings, which formed a very indifferent accompaniment to my performance. When I had finished, and any one came to take away my harp, the child opposed it with the most horrible cries. The harp was then left, and he played upon it in his own fashion, he scratched some of the cords, broke others, and soon put it completely out of tune. When any one told Madame d'Estourmelles that her child must annoy me excessively, she would ask me 'if that was the case?' and she pretended to take my polite negative in its literal sense, adding, that at my age one must be charmed to amuse one's self in an infantine manner, and that I formed with her son a delicious group. In fact, the child was not so disagreeable as people imagined; not that I loved his frolics, but his person interested and amused me. He was pretty, coxing, and droll, and he had nothing bad in his disposition. With a tolerable education he might have been easily made a delightful child. His poor mother has largely paid the forfeit of his bad education: the year following this, for the first time in his life, he had a little fever; he refused all sorts of drink, and demanded with violence all kinds of improper food; a slight indisposition became a serious disease, and soon a fatal one; for it was impossible to make him take medicine of any description, and all attempts of this kind threw him into fits of passion, that went even to convulsions. He died at the age of six, though he was naturally very stout, and of an excellent constitution."

Every mother will instinctively shrink from the idea that any of her own family could cut such a figure in company, and yet how very few take the proper means to prevent it. Many, after having already spoiled their child by negligent or weak indulgence, are occasionally aroused, by some excessive instance of bad conduct, and in their anger proceed to inflict severe chastisement, with the hope that so cruel and isolated a piece of severity will eradicate the habits which they have suffered to gain strength for years. But it only awakens the evil passions of the little victim, and renders remedy more hopeless. Nothing can be efficacious in such a case but a system of treatment, persevered in for months or years, by which mild punishment shall dispassionately and uniformly follow every offence. No improper indulgence should be ever allowed, and nothing be yielded to importunity or obstinacy. It may usually be taken for granted, when parents have themselves superintended the education of their children, that, in cases of their bad conduct, the latter are much less to blame than the former.

Another frequent fault of those entrusted with the care of youth, is the practice of conversing freely in their presence respecting their beauty and accomplishments, and of showing them off to strangers, who, of course, are lavish of their admiration. What must be the thoughts of an intelligent little girl, eight or nine years of age on hearing such expressions as "Is she not a sweet child?" "What a charming beautiful face!" "Now show us how well you can dance," &c. It is in this way that the early seeds of vanity find their way into the female bosom—that the love of admiration becomes a passion, which, while it weakens the affections, brings in its train art, selfishness, affectation, and coquetry. LITERARY NOTICES.

The Southern Review. No. XIII. May, 1831. Charleston. A. E. Miller. p. 259.

WE greet the re-appearance of this ably-conducted journal with a warm welcome. Its readers will derive great gratification from a perusal of this number. Its contents are as follows: "Byron's Letters and Journals; Beranger's Poems; the Life and Times of Daniel Foe; Murat's Letters on the United States; History of the Fine Arts; Steam-engine and Rail-roads; the Siamese Twins; Irving's Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Christopher Columbus; and Harper's Family Library, No. XVIII." The article on Byron is written in a strain of delightful eloquence and philosophy, and excites our astonishment that a work possessing such powerful claims upon the public notice should have hitherto appealed to it in vain. We shall require no apology for introducing a few extracts, valuable for the true estimate of the book, and the poet, among the innumerable existing contradictory opinions of both:

"The second volume of Mr. Moore's work is one of the most interesting books in the language. The success of the author is exactly in the inverse ratio of the space which he occupies in his own pages—of which he has, for this time, yielded the almost exclusive possession to the hero of his story. He has, indeed, presented us with the 'Confessions' of Lord Byron, made up of the most authentic and least suspicious of all possible materials—his letters, journals, and the like relics, thrown off with the impression of every varying mood upon them, and apparently without any intention, or even the remotest idea of giving them to the public. They exhibit, accordingly, without disguise or palliation, a view of his whole course of life during his last residence on the continent. We need not say that the life of which the secret post-scenia and deepest recesses are thus unexpectedly laid bare to the gaze of the world, is that of a man of pleasure—dashed, it is true, with the gloom of a complexional melancholy, or more brilliantly diversified by the mingled glories of genius and literature, and abruptly and prematurely terminating in a high tragic catastrophe—an atoning self-sacrifice, and a hero's grave."

"We repeat that we have read this book with intense interest. We do not know where the letters are to be found in any language which better repay a perusal. Perhaps as mere models of the epistolary style they are not so exquisite as some that might be cited. Even of this, however, we are far from being sure. If they do not equal, for instance, in grace and elegance, those of Gray or Lady Mary—if they are not specimens of that inimitable, ineffable brevetage, which makes those of Madame de Sévigné so entirely unique, they fully rival the best of them in spirit, piquancy, and, we venture to add, wit, while, like the epistles of Cicero, they not unfrequently rise from the most familiar colloquial ease and freedom into far loftier regions of thought and eloquence. We were particularly struck with this last peculiarity. We scarcely read one of them without being surprised into a smile—occasionally into a broad laugh—by some reckless waggery, some sudden descent from the sublime to the ridiculous, while there are many passages in which the least critical reader will not fail to recognise the hand that drew Childe Harold."

"Two other general observations have been suggested to us by the perusal of this volume: the first is, that, although, as we have already remarked, it exhibits a view of Lord Byron's life when he had abjured the realm and put himself out of the pale of English society, denying its authority, defying its power, setting at naught, with foul scorn, all its conventional decencies and established opinions, he appears to us in a much more amiable and estimable light as a man, than he did in the first part of the work. We are not troubled here with any sham pleas—any labored and abortive apologies of Mr. Moore, for what he must have known to be indefensible, if he had any moral sense at all. There is none of that whining and mawkish hypocrisy which we found so peculiarly disgusting in the history of the earlier part of Byron's life. He does not tell a tale of horror, and affect to palm it off upon his reader as a candid avowal of a peccadillo—he does not charge his hero with what amounts to parricide, and then lament the unfortunate peculiarities of a parent, which he more than insinuates, were a justification of such a monstrous perversion of nature—in short, he does not confess Byron to have been utterly heartless, by his very attempt (and a most awkward attempt) to find an excuse for him, in the tendency of genius to 'mount me up into the brain,' as honest Falstaff would say, but as Mr. Moore most daintily expresses it, 'to transfer the seat of sensibility from the heart to the fancy.' He tells, or rather he suffers Byron to tell, his story here without any grimace or dissimulation. The whole truth comes out in a round unvarnished tale, and yet it is scarcely possible to read these letters and not feel disposed rather to deplore the fate, than reprobate the conduct of the writer—the gifted and miserable possessor of so much that might be envied, admired, and loved—a fallen cherub, not only majestic, but touchingly beautiful and attractive, 'though in ruins,' with enough of his original goodness as well as brightness about him to make us feel what transcendent and glorious excellence he has forfeited, by those accidental circumstances or complexional peculiarities, or whatever else it were, by which, like one of his own heroes, 'he was betrayed too early and beguiled too long.'

"The gloomy and fierce passions which inspire the muse of Byron, seldom break forth in these letters; and as it has been said of Garrick, that it was only when he was off the stage that he was acting, so, if the epistolary correspondence of the poet is (as we take it to be) a fair specimen of his ordinary conversation, we should be inclined to look rather to the effusions of his imagination, than to those which are supposed to flow more immediately from the heart for the true image of his character. It is not so with common men—it is not so even with those who, possessing extraordinary talents, are in the habit, from policy or propriety or other motives, of exercising a strong self-control when they appear before the public. But Byron knew no such restraints—and then, all his poetry, as we remarked on a former occasion, was the language of feelings which he had brooded over until they were exalted into madness, and his brain burned as in a feverish delirium."

The second article is a review of Beranger's poems. This gentleman is the most popular French writer of the day, and is extensively known as having drawn upon himself the indignation of the police, in consequence of the tendency of his compositions to awaken and keep alive among the people a spirit of liberty. His history is here partially given, and much enhances the interest of the piece. We select the following anecdote of the poet:

"After the return of Louis the eighteenth, a certain minion of the court being out of favor, one of his political antagonists came to our poet, and giving him the materials of a lampoon upon the unlucky favorite, requested him to put them into verse. 'A la bonne heure,' replied the generous satirist, who appears to care as little for the grantees of the opposition as for those of the cabinet, 'A la bonne heure, quand il sera ministre.' It is a remarkable fact also, and one that may well be noticed in confirmation of the truth of this story, that while we have scarcely a line in praise of Napoleon during the period of his power—from the time of his fall, among the most touching of Beranger's stanzas are those which consist of tributes of admiration to his greatness, and sympathy with his sufferings. Thus we have 'Le Cinque Mai,' in the publication of 1821, and in the one before 'Les Deux Grenadiers,' and 'Souvenirs du Peuple,' the latter of which we have already mentioned."

It has been frequently observed of Robinson Crusoe that it is one of the most universally read books in the language, and it retains for us in age a charm almost as powerful, if not the same, as that which in early youth chained us to its delightful pages. The "Life and Times of De Foe" will, therefore, find many attentive readers. The third article contains an epitome of the work, with several valuable extracts.

In the observation upon "Murat's Letters on the United States," that gentleman is deservedly complimented upon the character of his productions, and the tenor of his life.

"We have seen few works, if any, on the subject of the United States, that contained, in so diminutive a compass, so much good sense and so little cant as the charming little volume at the head of this article. Though written in 1826, it was not published till last year. The writer, who is a nephew of Napoleon, is a gentleman of excellent education, and considerable powers of mind. He is intimately known throughout the states, most of which he has repeatedly visited; and, for several years, he has resided in Florida, universally beloved and respected. After the expiration of the probationary period required by our laws, he presented the novel spectacle of a prince renouncing his title, and requesting admission into a republic as a citizen. Having qualified himself for the practice of the legal profession, he was regularly enrolled among the members of the bar. This country, as he has emphatically told us in his answer to a late address by his fellow-citizens, is the land of his adoption—'I was (says he) among the first pioneers of the middle district of Florida. I have seen its many improvements raised up, as by magic, in the bosom of the wilderness. I have seen the members, composing a delightful society, arrive one by one from their distant homes—and it is impossible for me, in whatever situation I may be placed, to forget the strong feelings which all this has excited.' He has now left this country for France, where he is called by private affairs, and where we have no doubt he will distinguish himself by his republican principles. He has our warm wishes for the happy accomplishment of his objects, and for his speedy return to this land of his choice."

"His object in writing the letters which appear in this volume, as will be seen from the commencement of the first, is to give to a young friend in Europe, who had some intention to follow the writer's example, and settle in America, a general view of the states, with their respective characteristics, that he might be enabled to determine for himself to which part of this immense continent he should direct his steps. All that this design requires is a sketch, in which the prominent features of each division of the country and its inhabitants should be faithfully drawn. This we think Colonel Murat has happily accomplished; for though we do not deny that we have met with a few particulars in which we differ from him, yet, upon the whole, we think his correspondent may safely put his trust in his counsels. His first letter is dated Wascissa, near Tallahassee, Florida, July, 1826."

The article on the "Fine Arts" will be highly appreciated by the classical reader.

From the review of the "Siamese Twins" we select the subjoined as a specimen of the impression generally produced in this country by Mr Bulwer's excursion into the regions of poetry, and with it we close the article:

"The Siamese Twins" is, upon the whole, a wretched failure. We were at a loss to conceive, when we first took up the book, what use could be made of a lusus nature so very disagreeable in a satirical poem. Had it not been that the author, by the title of his work, warranted us in looking for something particularly facetious, we should have expected to find such a subject treated in rather a different style, and with far more power, by the author of the 'Disowned.' And accordingly, the only parts of this long poem, in four books and twelve chapters, that deserve the least praise, are those of a serious, and even gloomy complexion. As for the satire, as such, we venture to affirm that a more 'tragical piece of mirth' has not been indited since Nick Bottom and his company first appeared in Pyramus and Thisbe. We can scarcely help gaping even now when we think of the dreary and dismal waste through which, from a sheer sense of duty, and with great effort, we have made a most tedious journey. It is inconceivable how so clever a writer as the author of 'Pelham,' should so completely have mistaken his walk, or have failed so utterly to accomplish what he had in view. He has published two hundred pages of satire without point, buffoonery without gaiety, and doggerel without drollery or quaintness—the stupidest, without exception, and most vulgar variety of what is so expressively called in French, platitudes. Weary, flat, unprofitable—these three words are the summing up of what we have to say of this 'Satirical Tale of the Times'—considered as a satire.

"Mr. Bulwer's preface, which contains some good remarks, explains the drift of his work. We take leave to observe, however, upon what he says of those who have been condemned for being 'like Lord Byron,' in poetry, that no one can be more completely safe on that score than Mr. E. L. B."

Oswali of Athens. A tragedy, in five acts. By John Howard Payne. Not yet published. 1831.

It being the author's express desire to have this performance first brought out in the land of his nativity, he committed the manuscript to the charge of Mr. J. J. Adams, then playing in London, and the piece is now in rehearsal at the Chatham theatre. Having perused the manuscript, we are prepared to say something of its literary and dramatic merits.

The plot, which appears to have been suggested by some incidents of the late Greek revolution, is briefly as follows:

Abdulahmed, a petty Turkish despot, in the classic city of Athens, was the favorite of his sultan; and, according to his own account, might have enjoyed a much higher station, had not private reasons induced him to accept of his present office. A fair Greek captive, whose life he had saved (some sixteen years previous to the opening of the play) when all her wealthy family had perished beneath the fury of the remorseless Turks, had rewarded him with her love. But this part of the story had better be told by himself, omitting the responses and remarks of the confidant to whom he is entrusting the secret:

"It fell on me to enforce
A tribute from the Greeks on the Morea.
The fools were obstinate. From their town my ships
Drove them to seek the mountains. I landed men—
Pursued them—and with death and desolation
Taught them what 'twas to disobey the sultan.
One through we followed to a height, whose woods
Were o'erthrew'd by a precipice. One side of it
We fired the forest, and upon the other
A chosen band of veterans rushed on them!
Then mothers reared their infants in the air
And dash'd them in the blazing gulf below!
All fell, self-slaughtered!—All, except one Greek,
Who tottered, bleeding, on a female arm.
But, as he raised his gun, in act to fire,
Dropp'd dead on the bare rock! The girl, one moment
Stood like a statue—then, above the flame
Outstretch'd her arms; and, with hair wildly floating,
Hung like an angel o'er a blazing world!
But, as she sprang, I rush'd with my own band
Amid the havoc—caught her—she was saved!

—and when she found
I did not urge the advantage of my power,

But only sought her wealth to give it back,
And leave her free—her gratitude was love.

Their intercourse, however, was of short duration. Religious scruples and remorse, on the part of the fair christian, induced her to demand of her protector the ceremonies of her own church. Being refused, she fled, and he could never discover her retreat. His feelings on this bereavement are, bating several careless inaccuracies in the metre, well depicted:

Through all the groves where she was wont to wander
I flew to seek her. At each turn I seem'd
To catch a glimpse of her loved form—'twas delirium!
No form was there! Wildly I sought her chamber—
There every object seem'd to breathe of her—
Her lute was on the sofa—and its silence
Spoke to me with her voice—the light scarf,
Which had so often waved upon her bosom,
When it poured forth its eloquence, appeared,
Like me, to expect her, and like me to think
She was not gone—she could not be—for ever!
But when the fatal truth burst on my soul—
Allah!—its desolation!—Millions
Of years of misery seem'd crush'd within
That hour! I closed the chamber up! I fled—
I hid the serpent anguish in my breast—
It drew its icy coil around my heart!
Strangled ambition, sympathy, and hope!

This is strong language, and cannot fail of being effective in the mouth of a chaste and judicious declaimer.

The fair fugitive had fled to a pleasant mountainous retreat, in the island of Scio, where she became a mother, and lived in security and tranquillity until the period when the drama commences. In this rural seclusion the daughter, Ianthe, grew up and was educated; and here she first met with Oswali, the nominal hero of the piece, who had visited Scio to rouse up his oppressed countrymen, and urge them to shake off the fetters of Turkish despotism.

Oswali's exertions to kindle the flame of liberty in the island of Scio are rendered nugatory by the timidity or coldness of the inhabitants. The following soliloquy on the subject will afford the reader an idea of the author's style. An occasional deficiency of rhythm is here also perceptible.

No ear to listen—all turn coldly from me,
Or basely plead for bondage! Lovely Scio!
Thou on whom nature's hand has lavish'd all
The poets' fancy paints of paradise.
What! shall thy trellices of clustering vines,
Thy thick groves, bending underneath the weight
Of the pomegranate, orange, fig, and lemon,
But scent the air and spread their shade for slaves!
The love of wealth has killed thy love of glory!
The chain e'en charms thee, because bright with gold!
Where are the times when swords, which flash'd for freedom,
Made Homer's birth-place worthy of its son?
Degraded island! blush to show the traveller
Where the great master-genius dwelt and moved,
Till you show souls that his would not have scorned!
Lo! where the far-off giant Arran mountains
Look down on Samos in the dark blue deep!
Why, cradle of Pythagoras, dost not
Thy wizard's magic hover still around thee,
And conjure back to earth departed heroes?
To fill the forms which wear the name of Greeks,
And save his island from the degradation
Which takes the beauty from its sister's smile?
Or has the spirit of the sage, indignant,
Charm'd from the serpent tyranny its venom,
To let our people wanton with its wreaths,
And find a glory in its glittering scales!

(Music of procession heard.)

—Again!
Those hated sounds of revelry again!
Ay, there they go—there—there! In gay procession
The slaves convey their mastic gum—the treasure
Most prized in their rich life—in tribute to
Their moslem ruler! Ay! dance—dance and laugh—
Toss the white turbans the Turk lets you wear,
Because ye're baser miscreants than the rest!
And let the cymbal and the kettle-drum
Proclaim what pride you take in your disgrace!

Oswali is a youthful patriot, the son of a "family of high note in Athens," and has been educated abroad. Abdulhamed hates the young man's father, for reasons assigned in the play, and is, therefore, determined to wreak his vengeance on the son, the father being beyond his reach, having become the superior of a christian monastery on Mount Athos. Speaking of Oswali, the turbaned tyrant says:

The old man gave his fortune to his son,
And left him free to choose his own career.
He was sent hence, to glean from foreign climes
All they could teach to enrich his native land.
The Greeks look up to him—I know not why—
As one heaven-destined to achieve their glory.
—That boy's father
Has set the incubus upon my soul,
Which turns my life to chaos! His religion
Has wrought this ruin! 'Tis through his religion
My arm shall strike for vengeance at the son.
Now hear me, Murad; I must win that boy,
And make him worship me. I know his temper,
But know such tempers may be won most easily.
Murad, I'd have him wrought to curse this faith,
And his fond Greece to cover him with curses!
Hasten to Scio—have him back to me—
If art should fail, tempt him to do some deed
To justify the exercise of force.

Murad hastens to Scio, insults Ianthe, and is slain by Oswali, who is, in consequence, compelled to take refuge with Ianthe's mother, Zefreni, and becomes the daughter's tutor. The natural result of all this is, the young couple become desperately in love, and the cause of Greece is almost forgotten by the hero, who has previously sworn to effect her emancipation, or perish in the attempt. In the mean time, Abdulhamed hears of the death of his confidant, and swears to avenge it with his own hand. For this purpose he hastens to Scio with an armed force—lands, searches the island, and finally discovers Oswali's retreat, and forces an entrance into the house. Oswali defends the passage, and disarms the Turk, but is instantly disarmed in turn by opposing numbers. Abdulhamed aims a pistol at Oswali—Zofreni rushes between them, and receives the shot in her bosom. An eclatrisment takes place—the Turk recognises his long lost Zaida, as he calls her, who, with her dying breath, bequeathes to him his daughter, and recommends Oswali to his friendship and protection. The agonized Abdulhamed promises to be the young man's friend; the mother dies, and Ianthe accompanies her new-found father and her lover to Athens.

It is now high time to introduce the reader to another character—the real hero of the drama—for such is, in fact, the gallant Lambros, although Oswali gives it the title.

Lambros and Oswali have been sworn friends from the time they were school-boys, and both have pledged themselves to heaven and to each other, to sacrifice every consideration to the emancipation of their native country from Turkish thralldom. Lambros is older than his friend, equally patriotic, but more cool and dispassionate; not so romantic, and less susceptible of female influence. Lambros is the Pierre and Oswali the Jaffier of the great enterprise in which they are engaged. In some respects Lambros resembles Brutus, and Oswali Cassius. Their friendship for each other was ardent sincere, and wholly unalloyed by any selfish considerations.

Lambros is erroneously informed that his friend Oswali has been taken prisoner by Abdulhamed in Scio, while protecting a Greek girl, and instantly raises forces to fly to his rescue. As soon as the Turk hears of this insurrection, he artfully deceives Oswali, by describing it as an attempt of some rash lover to take away his beloved Ianthe by force. The consequence is, that Oswali volunteers to lead the Turks to battle, and does not discover his error until he finds himself fighting against his own dear friend, and the patriots that friend had assembled for the rescue of Oswali. Nor does he even make this discovery until Lambros is brought in chains before him!

The scene which follows is very effective, though it is, in fact, only a new version of that one in Venice Preserved, where Pierre so cruelly reproaches Jaffier, after the adjournment of the senate. Lambros has raised his life for his friend; who, instead of being a captive to the enemy, as he supposed, is found in arms against him! He will listen to no explanation, and they part; Lambros to his dungeon, and the almost distracted Oswali to his own chaotic reflections. A conspiracy is next got up, in which Oswali swears to kill the tyrant Abdulhamed. Ianthe intercedes for her father, and Oswali stabs her to the heart. He now becomes actually lunatic, and the scene is wrought up to a pitch of intense interest. The conspiracy succeeds—the flag of freedom waves from every eminence—Abdulhamed's power is no more—the patriots are triumphant—Greece is free; and, in a lucid interval, Oswali is reconciled to his friend, in whose arms he expires, and joins his beloved Ianthe in a better world.

During the romantic ravings of Oswali, after the death of Ianthe, he gives utterance to the following; addressing his friend, whom he mistakes for Minerva, Plato, &c.:

While I adored the praises of the crowd,
Shrunk from its sneer, and damned myself for fame!
I aim'd at all, and now myself am nothing!
We'll reason, Plato, about immortality—
Friendship is dead—and love is dead—and honor!
The life of life being gone, can life survive?
Tear up your books, and let the world despair!
(A trumpet is heard.)

Hark! how the trumpet fills the air with war!
Draw, soldiers! draw, and charge! This voice
Shall fall! by my arm shall fall! His daughter! What
Is one poor life to freedom for a nation!
Mount, Grecians! mount! The citadel is ours!
They pluck the horsetail banners up and fly!
See! by the sabre's flash—they fall—they writhe!
Through the cleft turban how the crimson streams!
And red hands, twisted in their one long lock,
Flurl spouting heads like meteors o'er the steep,
The lips yet quivering with the dying curse!
On, patriots! on! Vengeance, your hour is come!
What prodigy is this! See! see! the crescent
Descending from the sky! Diana's self!
She bears it on her brow! I know that face—
It is Ianthe's! In her train a fight
Of hours from the paradise of Mahomet!
They flit their wings of silver in my eyes,
And dazzle me to blindness! But I'll not
Be cheated of my prey thus—"I was a murderer!
Her father! Never! What! a Turk her father!
My oath on't 'tis a lie, and he shall pay for't!
For all your art, ye train of wily spirits,
I'll have him! There! My steel is nobly sheathed!

We think the tragedy of Oswali an effective piece, which will detract nothing from the well-earned dramatic reputation of the author. Indeed we shall be much mistaken if it does not rank with his best. If the poetry is not of the first order, it is far above mediocrity. The incidents, situations, and scenery are highly dramatic; and the pure, fervid spirit of patriotism, which breathes through every line, cannot but be acceptable to an American auditor.

The Mussulman By R. R. Madden, Author of Travels in Turkey, Egypt, Nubia and Palestine. Colburn and Bentley. London. 1831. 3 vols.—(Third notice.)

Although Mr. Madden's views of Turkish character are given in the form of romance, yet competent critics have pronounced it a faithful representation. Suleyman, the Aga of Bournabashi, the oppressor of a district in Turkey, embracing in its confines the plain of Troy, wreaks his wrath upon the person of a Greek whom some change of fortune had thrown from wealth and luxury to poverty and privation. The christian's wife was beautiful, and he is suffered to depart for the three hundred piastres which he had agreed to pay for her ransom.

"In Turkey, the bowels of the earth are the banking-houses of the people, consequently panics are less frequent than in the countries of Franguestan, for nothing short of an earthquake can shake the old firm, the original fountain of capital. At any period perhaps it would be difficult to find one half the bullion of the empire, above the surface of the soil. Deep beneath, the treasures are deposited, which no coffer on the earth would be strong enough to preserve from the rapacity of the rulers of the land. The little Greek no sooner reached his dwelling, then he commenced digging up his garden in twenty places, in order, had he been watched, to throw his observers on the wrong scent; and finally, with a heavy heart, he visited the real sepulchre of his soul, ravaged the interior of an old saucepan, and disinterred a handful of sequins. Having counted out three hundred piastres, he secreted the remainder in the lining of his unmentionables, and proceeded to the Divan. There he paid down the hard cash in the presence of the Aga; but no sooner was the stipulated sum paid, than the Aga gave way to ungovernable wrath, 'Allah Akbar Mahomet rassar Allah!' he exclaimed, there is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet; three hundred piastres indeed! giaour kafir, pessavink, scoundrel of an unbelieving dog! will three hundred piastres pay my poor soldiers for fatiguing themselves to death to find a substitute for you? Whose dog are you, who dares to laugh at my beard?'—'Noble Effendi,' exclaimed the Greek, 'and very best of governors, I am your dog, I am your servant, the most abject of your slaves; take pity on my poverty, my family are without bread, we are utterly destitute. God sees my misery; indeed I have not another piastre in the wide world.'—'Count out two hundred more,' cried the Aga, 'and fifty besides, for the lies you have uttered: do it instantly, or undergo the punishment your cursed obstinacy deserves.' The poor wretch protested, according to custom, that if a para could save his father's soul from the devil, he had it not; that if it pleased his lord, the best of governors, to order his servant's body to be flogged into a jelly, the servant of his excellency could not help it, he could not command a single asper to save his flesh; and as he was a religious Greek, he called every saint in the calendar to witness his utter destitution.

"The Aga looked at one of his soldiers: a stranger could have observed no visible gesture, no external sign, no waving of the hand, no motion of the lips, but in the twinkling of an eye, the Greek was capsize, his legs fastened in a noose, attached to a long stick held by two brawny Arnauts, and a couple of ferashes stationed at either side, with well-seasoned sticks, which instantly fell on the bare soles of the unfortunate rayah. The stripes were inflicted with terrible velocity, and each resounded as it fell, and notwithstanding the screams of the sufferer, were even audible to his wretched wife, who was stationed at the door. 'Iman Effendi! Iman Effendi!' followed every blow, 'take pity on me, sir! take pity on me!' but the cry was disregarded, the blood streamed from the ankles, but the sight made no pause in the torture. The Aga continued to smoke his water-pipe with the imperturbable indifference becoming his high place: it was only when two hundred and fifty blows had been laid on, that he waved his hand, and the exhausted executioners had leisure to wipe the perspiration from their brows. 'Now, giaour,' said the Aga, 'are you disposed to pay the remainder of your just and lawful debt.'—'Best of governors!' cried the culprit, raising his head from the ground, 'I am a dead man, but money I have none—heaven knows the truth, would I have my feet mangled as they are if I had wherewithal to purchase mercy?'—'Since you are so very poor, life is of no value, then down with the dog,' he continued, addressing the executioners. 'Vras, vras! kill, kill! let him have a thousand lashes!' The consternation of the Greek was great, but his love of money was still greater. The number of stripes now ordered to be inflicted, generally proves fatal; in fact, nine out of ten, of those who receive above eight hundred, die. Again the bastinado was resumed, upwards of a hundred blows more were inflicted, the shrieks of the poor wretch became gradually indistinct; at length they ceased altogether, and he no longer writhed under the blows; there was no effusion of blood, except where the noose which secured the legs, lacerated the skin; but the feet presented the appearance of tumid masses of livid flesh, streaked here and there with blue and crimson. 'Enough!' said the governor, 'let us hear if he will still persist in refusing to pay his debts: raise the infidel, and let him answer.' One of the Albanians accordingly endeavored to rouse him with a blow over the stomach, which would have been fatal in any other country, but people in Turkey take more killing than even an Hibernian could imagine. The Aga prevented a repetition of the blows; the soldiers grumbled as they laid down their bludgeons. Whoever has witnessed the punishment of the bastinado must have observed that the operation is generally commenced with coolness; but as the fatigue of the officers of justice augments, the fury of his passion is let loose on the victim, whose crime they are most probably unacquainted with, and when the last blow is given, it is sure to be the heaviest, and to be accompanied with a malediction on the father and mother of the wretch they have beaten. Now whether Jack Ketch feels any personal animosity against his clients, we know not; but we never saw a school-boy flogged where passion did not add to the gravamen of the pedagogue's last stripe. The Greek either was or appeared to be insensible. The Aga concluded he had no more money, he therefore ordered him to be thrown out of doors, a ceremony which was performed in the most unceremonious way imaginable. He lay motionless as a corpse till the soldiers of the best of governors were out of sight. He then contrived to get upon his legs and hobbled home much faster than could have been expected, exulting in the greatest triumph a Greek can achieve, the heroidal endurance of the bastinado in order to preserve his purse."

THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

MASTER BURKE has returned to the Park, and is playing his old parts with his usual success. Cinderella is at present his most equal opponent. By the way, we cannot pass over the mention of this opera, without noticing the marked improvement of Thorne as Dandini. Both as an actor and vocalist, he is either making actual progress, or his ability is becoming more generally known. We learn by a letter from New-Orleans, that Mr. C. Kean and Miss Clara Fisher have been uncommonly successful at the south. They will receive about three thousand dollars each from their engagements at that city and Natchez, and are not immediately expected here. The southern papers are loud in their praise. At the Bowery several entertainments have been produced. The house itself is decorated with taste, and presents an appearance of light and airy elegance, which reflects much credit on the artists. There are several good performers, on whose relative merits we are unwilling to decide upon so slight an examination. The Water Witch has very deservedly had a successful run. The plot is rather deficient in interest; and one odd-looking gentleman, who seems "much abused" by the rest of the "dramatis persone," might nearly as well have been omitted, yet the Yankee is really laughable, and full of characteristic drollery; and the ocean scene is altogether a well managed and most effective spectacle. Miss Pelby sustains a part in the drama with both grace and spirit, and Mrs. Barret dashed through one of Cooper's artificial characters, with ease and animation. The Chatham is doing very well, and commands the patronage of a large portion of our play-going population. Mr. Finn, a clever actor, and gifted with the genuine comic humor, (we say nothing of his annual!) is an attraction. His Bob Logic is capital—it is just "the thing." Blake's Jerry is also a pleasant affair. It is said that the popular burletta of "Tom and Jerry" is soon to be produced. We are unacquainted with any theatre where it could be more efficiently sustained; barring one or two of the fourth or fifth rate people, who are execrable. It contains a part for Thayer, which, in his hand, is a perfect antidote to "loathed melancholy." One thing must not be forgotten. The whole strength of the managers must be laid out on the music. Cinderella has sounded the death knell of all pretenders in the art. The orchestra must be increased, and drilled. The success of the piece will depend upon the character of this department.

This neat little theatre fills our minds with many pleasant associations. We have seen it grow up through its insipid forms of an ice-cream garden—a tent—a shed—a house—until the ever-busy enterprise of its original proprietor at length reared this fanciful structure, and sometimes filled it with the best histrionic talents in the land. Poor Barrere! well do we recall thy little, restless, watchful form; thy explosions of displeasure, when some unlucky scene-shifter sent a forest into a parlor, or joined a half palace to a semi-dungeon. We remember an anecdote, illustrative of his blended simplicity and cunning, which is said to have really occurred. It appears he had exhausted the customary phraseology of the play-bills—the cataracts with real water, the statues struck with lightning, oceans in a storm, burning of the count's castle, &c. and in this dilemma applied to a friend for some new device.

"I must have somesing to bring de peoples to my house—I shall have nosing to make for profit, if I don't have somesing to make dem open der eyes, and say, aha! de grand spectacle at the Chatham. I shall go, because de little Chatham is de best teatre in all de world. Now vat I shall put up at de top of de bills—somesing grand, majestic, sublime—eh! vat it shall be?"

His friend happened to be a wag—and wags are sad dogs, for the sake of a joke. It's meat and drink to them—a temptation is irresistible.

"Ah, ah," said the friend, "I have it. You shall print in large characters—'Grand fracas to-night at the Chatham.'"

"Grand fracas!" said Barrere; "vat is dat grand fracas? I nevair have hear him before."

"Oh," said the other, "it means a grand—a grand attraction—a sort of a—in short, it means something that everybody runs to see."

"Eh bien!" said the manager, "he shall be done."

The next afternoon might be seen knots of people gaping and staring up at the old pumps and dilapidated wooden fences, which announced the "grand fracas." The bills really drew a crowd, particularly in the pit, of what character may be easily imagined. Butcher-boys, coal-carriers, sailors, idlers, and raggamuffins of every description; cat-calls, screams, groans, and hisses resounded, and the curtain rose to such vociferous shouts, as struck the manager with amazement. It so happened, that two pugnacious, greasy citizens in the pit, did volunteer to exercise their talents for pugilism, and created a broil, in which a large portion of their companions joined; a scene of confusion ensued; benches were broken, lamps extinguished, and, it is said, that if many on their return home had called the roll of their teeth, some of the most prominent members of the company would have been found among the missing. As he was one of the most enterprising managers, so he was the most passionate. He went off like a little cannon at the touch of a match. We draw a veil over the hour which revealed to him the trick. Old King Lear was nothing to him.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Philolexian Society.—The twenty-ninth anniversary of this society, was celebrated on Thursday evening, the nineteenth instant. The room in Columbia College in which the exhibition took place, was crowded with an overflowing auditory, principally composed of ladies. Dr. Francis commenced the exercises by a salutatory address, comprising many interesting details respecting the institution, and the distinguished gentlemen whose early studies had been pursued within its walls. His observations displayed considerable research and erudition appropriate to the occasion, rendered palatable by a style so light and agreeable, that even the passages of the learned languages with which such a discourse is necessarily sprinkled, were listened to by the fairer portion of his hearers with grave and profound attention. Its information was circumstantial and accurate, without being tedious, and its conclusion wrought up with both ingenuity and elegance. His delivery was unaffected, and yet full of animation.

An extract from Mr. Webster's celebrated speech on the Union, was next recited by Mr. Anthony Ten Broeck. A better specimen of eloquence could scarcely have been selected. It is truly soul-stirring, and yet marked by a chaste and noble simplicity, and places Mr. Webster first among American orators. The speaker gave it much effect, and although a little deficient in warmth, upon so inspiring a subject, the gestures and reading were both correct and graceful.

A forensic discussion of the question, "Is reason competent to discover the immortality of the soul?" was conducted in a very creditable manner, by L. Saxbury Waddel and Robert G. Vermilye.

An oration was next delivered by Mr. Thomas E. Blanche, on "the importance of metaphysics, and the causes of their present disrepute." This young gentleman struck out very boldly into a path of reasoning which displayed much thought. Notwithstanding several eccentricities of opinion, he occasionally surprised us with observations of force and truth, which argued familiarity with a subject not generally deemed attractive.

Mr. Frederick L. Talcott then recited "The meeting of Wallace and Bruce," in which he exhibited the power, rarely possessed, of reading poetry well. The exercises concluded with an oration on "The punishment of death," and a valedictory address by Mr. Robert J. Dillon; marked both by force of argument and fluency of language. The speaker supported the more merciful side of a question which will employ the pens of many future statesmen and philanthropists.

The audience, in the intervals of the exercises, were regaled with music, and were by no means backward in expressions of approbation.

Ancient philosophy.—The first system of philosophy among the Greeks, was that of Anaxagoras, who flourished between the seventieth and eighty-eighth olympiads.

1. He assumed as a first principle that space was infinite, and that there was a supreme intelligence which had arranged and disposed all the beings in the universe.

2. That in the beginning all things were blended together, and in this state of confusion they remained until an intelligence separated and disposed them as we now see them.

3. That this intelligence was nothing else but the Supreme Being, and that there was no other God.

4. That there was no such thing as a vacuum, and that atoms were divisible ad infinitum.

5. That the sun was nothing but a ball of red-hot iron, as large as the Peloponnesus.

6. That air was the cause of the motion of the stars, and that the earth was a plane.

7. That the waters which flow on the surface of the earth, when rarefied by the heat of the sun, pass into vapor, which rises into the middle region of the air, and falls down in rain.

8. That the first animals were generated by heat and moisture.

9. A stone having fallen from the sky, he immediately concluded the sky was composed of paving stones!

There is an odd mixture of the sublime and ludicrous in this system. The supreme intelligence approaches to the christian doctrines; the separation and disposal of all things into order, by this intelligence, and the conclusions drawn from it are also strictly consonant to the same rule of faith; while the red-hot ball of iron and the paving stones furnish a strange anti-climax to the noble conceptions of a deity. The notion of the creation of animals by heat and moisture is another strange incongruity; for why not resort to the Great First Cause? The intelligence which could arrange the chaotic materials of the universe into order and beauty, was certainly adequate to the creation of an animal.

Emigrants.—The brig Paris, from Bristol, which arrived on Saturday, brought a number of English adventurers to our shores, of a kind calculated to be really advantageous to the country. Among others, we noticed a sturdy looking farmer and his wife, with six or seven little "blooming responsibilities," about to seek their fortunes in the western part of this state. They present a characteristic picture of English health and enterprise, with cheeks like round and rosy apples. We should hesitate to incur the personal resentment of the robust mother; and the vigorous leader of the band, with corduroy unmentionables, white top-boots, and five or six hundred pounds in his pocket, is no objectionable addition to our growing population.

Style.—The wordy circumlocutions with which some writers surround a simple idea are amusing. Every one remembers the fine lady, who, after having several times, without effect, desired her maid to "take off the excrescence from the nocturnal luminary," at length impatiently told her to "snuff the candle." The author of the following umbrageous sentence, which we extract from a really good article in the Foreign Literary Gazette, would do well to attach a similar epitome of his meaning, for the benefit of plain readers:

"It would seem that mediocrity, grasping the pen which traces the career of genius, can explain but by the absence of every human virtue the faculties with which superior beings alone are gifted—that the littleness of malignant inferiority, affecting an impartial appreciation of powers whose existence cannot be disputed, would fain distract public admiration by placing in the opposite balance the agonising mental afflictions visited on monstrous and mysterious crime."

The Poles.—It is impossible to watch the struggles of this gallant people, and the success with which they have recently been attended, without a strong hope that they may establish their rights upon a permanent basis. Yet, although unwilling to break in upon the rejoicings of the friends of rational government with any discordant note, the anticipations which the late defeat of the Russians arouses, are not unmingled with doubt and solicitude as to the future career of the conquerors. The private correspondence from Warsaw draws a frightful picture of the brutal and monstrous barbarity of the Russians. The London Courier of the eighth ultimo, however, contains the following: "we believe we can state with certainty that the powers who were parties to the treaty of Vienna, will not permit Russia to incorporate Poland with her own dominions."

Judge Trumbull.—The venerable Judge Trumbull, who expired on the twelfth instant, was born in 1750, at Watertown, Connecticut. In 1775 he published the first part of McFingal. Its popularity may be conceived from the fact that it passed through thirty editions. He was for many years a member of the state legislature of Connecticut, and in 1801, was appointed a judge of the superior court, in addition to which he afterwards received the appointment of judge of the supreme court of errors. He died by the gradual abatement of his natural strength.

Light.—At the Royal Society of Edinburgh, on the twenty-first of March, a communication from Dr. Brewster was read, containing an account of a new analysis of white solar light. He showed that it consists of the three primary colors, red, yellow, and blue; and that the other colors, reflected by the prism, are also compounds of these. A portion of white light cannot be decomposed at all.

Sunday schools.—A note to the last number of the North American Review states, that the original founder of Sunday-schools was Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, in the sixteenth century; and adds, "they have never, we believe, been intermitted, to this day, in that diocese."

Mrs. Opie.—This distinguished female is at present residing at Paris, and is engaged in composing a work on the state of society in that metropolis.

Cheap travelling.—The proprietors of the steam-boat James Kent advertise to take passengers from this city to Hartford, for one dollar each.

Fulton Ferry.—A resolution has been submitted to the board of aldermen, to apply to the legislature for a reduction of the rate of ferriage.

Fugitive poetry.—The annexed stanzas have been selected and sent us for insertion by a fair correspondent. Her taste is so good that we cannot deny her request.

LEARNING AND LOVE.

Said nature one day—"For the peace of mankind,
Let woman and man have their kingdoms apart;
To man I assign the cold regions of mind—
To woman the sunny domains of the heart."

The partition was fair, and the boundaries plain,
Between learning and love—between beauty and books;
Contented was man, in his black-letter reign,
And he left laughing woman her love-darting looks.

But restless Zitiella must kindle a feud,
And stir up a war of the studies and bowers;
Too proud for the limits wise nature deemed good,
From her own rightful empire she burst upon ours.

We thought ourselves safe in our Latin or Greek,
But Plato has yielded, and Tully is taken;
What we can but read, dread Zitiella can speak—
Her books of the boudoir are Berkeley and Bacon.

Sweet pedant, beware! all the world is arrayed
To check your ambition, your schemes to oppose;
The scholar, if routed, will soon have the aid
Of a legion of dames—to a woman, your foes.

The kingdom of hearts is enough for your share;
Oh! unharass your owl, and depend on your dove;
There is learning enough in this world—and to spare—
But, ah! my Zitiella! there's too little love!

A VISION.

The night-mare came to my silent bed
In the peaceful hour of night,
When at rest was laid my heavy head,
And the ink-horn vanished quite.

Oh, think of the horrible shape it wore!
It was not a demon grim;
Nor a dragon, with scales and tails a score;
Nor a head without a limb;

Nor a mock fiend, with a maddening laugh!
Nor the whirling sails of a mill;
Nor a cup of blood for the lips to quaff,
In despite of the shuddering will:

Nor a monstrous bird with a funeral note;
Nor a black dog on my breast;
Nor the ghost of Burke, with its gripe on my throat,
That came to disturb my rest:

But my sister Poll, with a gray-goose quill,
And an album—sight of sorrow!
"Get up," she cried, "and a whole page fill,
For this book must go back to-morrow!"

WIND THY HORN, MY HUNTER BOY.

A FAVORITE GERMAN AIR, SUNG BY CHARLES E. HORN, AT THE PARK THEATRE—WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE—ARRANGED BY HENRY R. BISHOP.

Spiritoso.

p Wind thy horn, my hun - ter boy, And leave thy lute's in - glo-rious sighs; Hunt-ing is the he - ro's joy, Till war his no - ble game sup-plies.

p Lento. Ad Lib.

Hark! the hounds' bells ring - ing sweet, While hun-ters shout, and the woods re-peat, Hil-li ho, hil li ho, Hil-li ho, hil-li ho.

Dol. pp

p Cres. f Cres. ff ff

SECOND VERSE.

Wind again thy cheerful horn,
Till echo, faint with answering, dies;
Burn, bright torches, burn till morn,
And lead us where the wild boar lies.
Hark! the cry "he's found, he's found!"
While hill and valley our shouts resound,
Hilli ho! hilli ho!
Hilli ho! hilli ho!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

AUTHORITY.

In a country like ours, where there is no standing army sufficiently numerous to maintain and enforce the legislative and judicial decisions, as in the old governments of Europe, they must, in a great measure, depend for their support on the authority derived from the character of the legislators and judges, and the consequent respect and veneration of the people. No man ought, therefore, for this reason, wantonly to treat them with disrespect, or attempt to weaken their authority by calumnies.

SPRING.

Why should the grumbling things, call'd men, complain,
That they enjoy but one poor fleeting spring
In fourscore or a hundred tedious years,
When Nature and her offspring are renew'd
In all their vernal beauties every year?
Has not the all-gracious power made rich amends
By giving memory to renew our joys,
Even from the period of our youthful spring;
Fancy, to paint a thousand fairer scenes
Than spring e'er offer'd to the eye of boyhood,
And last of all—hath he not given us hope,
Whose sweet anticipations far outdo
All that the spring of life e'er realiz'd?

ATONEMENT.

The sufferings of the wicked may atone
For their own sins, not others.
The innocent alone can be peace-offerings
For others' crimes. So the old patriarchs,
Would offer up some inoffensive lamb
That never sinn'd, or thought of such a thing;
And so the high Beneficent above
Gave his own son, as spotless and as pure,
To atone for all mankind, because of all
The human race there was not one
But had enough to answer for himself.

CURIOUS TRIO.

Mr. Dallas, when secretary of the treasury of the United States, told me the following story, which he had from Mr. Breck:—When the Duc de Liancourt was in Philadelphia, some time after the execution of Louis the sixteenth, Mr. Breck called to see him at his lodgings, in Strawberry-alley. Knocking at the door of a mean-looking house, a little ragged girl came out, who, on being asked for the duke, pointed to a door, which Mr. B. entered. At a little deal table he found Cobbett, teaching the duke and Monsieur Talleyrand English!

TASTE.

I am tempted to believe that what is called improvement in taste is sometimes but the loss of feeling and sensibility.

THE PARSON AND BUTCHER.

A parson and a butcher chanced, they say,
To meet and moralize one sabbath day.
"Ah!" cries the parson, "all things good and fair,
"All that is virtuous, wise, beloved, and rare,
"Is sure the first to feel the stroke of fate,
"While vice and folly have a longer date."
"True," cries the butcher, "for it is decreed,
"The fattest pig, alas! must soonest bleed."

BARGAINS.

One of the best bargains I recollect in ancient times was the exchange of Glaucus with Diomedes. He gave his suit of brass armor for one of gold.

A PAIR OF TWINS.

Sorrow and man are weeping twins of earth,
Conceived together, born at the same birth;
Together through this peevish world they play,
They live together, and together die.

CHANGES.

THE world hath many changes—
The fair and verdant earth
Wears not the look it wore when first
Heaven smiled upon its birth.
Dark rolls the flood of ages,
And whelms beneath its tide
The monuments of man's renown,
His glory and his pride!
Where are those ancient cities—
The proudest of their day?
Their pomp, their splendor—all are gone—
Passed like a dream away!
Some hath the earthquake swallowed,
Some have an ocean tomb,
Some in the red volcano's wrath
Have met their fiery doom.
And some to dark oblivion
Have sunk by slow decay,
Their very luxury hath worn
Their strength and power away.
And is it but the tokens
Of art and skill alone,
Is it but in the works of man
The power of change is shown?
Alas! whatever changes
In this fair earth have been,
None are so sad and strange as those
Which in ourselves are seen.
Our fairest feelings wither,
Our brightest hopes depart,
And sweet and pleasant thoughts lie dead,
And a blight falls on the heart.
And all that once could charm us
Seems dull, and drear, and strange,
Till scarce we recognize ourselves,
So deep and dark the change.
But with a sudden spirit,
We look on those around,
And feel more bitterly the change
That oft in them is found.
The eye we loved is altered
And answers ours no more,
But cold and careless is the glance
That beamed with love before.
The lip whose smile of welcome
So long was all our own,
Whose accents ever breathed to us
Affection's cordial tone,
Now smiles on us no longer,
And breathes no gentle word,
But cold politeness moulds each phrase
Which from those lips is heard.
Ah! sad it is to wander
A path bereft of flowers,
And with the phantom of those friends
That are no longer ours.
Yet is not this a lesson
To wean from earthly things
The heart of man, which still too much
To earthly objects clings?
To bid our hopes look onward
To that immortal home
Where lurks no dark deceit, and where
No change can ever come!

THYRA.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 111.

THE human character is so nicely balanced between good and evil, that it is impossible to ascertain its original tendency. If there sometimes occur instances of feeling and magnanimity which impress us with a conviction of its inherent noble and generous nature, there happen, on the other hand, examples of vice and baseness—so vile, brutal, and loathsome, that we are again bewildered amidst the admiration and abhorrence which its contradictory qualities excite. The early and unsettled stages of society develop strong vices and virtues. Instead of being a restraint upon crimes, the law is but an instrument in the hands of the powerful with which the innocent and the needy are beaten down to the dust. Are we then to consider that it is only the law which keeps the good citizens from stabbing their wealthy neighbors for their property, and putting judge and jury to rout with armed retainers? No, replies the philanthropist. It is not the law, but the dawn of civilization which softens, while it elevates the character. Education teaches the policy of peace and justice. The arts delight and subdue the passions. It is not that man is more restrained, but that he is intrinsically better. "Alas!" said the Genius, "for thy dreams of philanthropy. Knowest thou not that as the great crimes of the unsettled ages are broken up, they divide into innumerable others, inspired by avarice, selfishness, and envy—that men accomplish by fraud what they once wrought by violence—that bold oppression, prompted by lofty courage, is at present superseded by dark envy or base submission. But come, I wish to reveal to you a characteristic feature in the disposition of your fellow mortals, and leave you to determine whether it may be ascribed to the cowardly effeminacy of modern times, or whether it is inherent in human nature?"

I saw in the glass a person well-known in this community, and I again knew that I was to witness no fictitious romance, but another representation of reality. The gentleman alluded to was a gray-headed old man, who had gone through the windings and turnings of his long life without a blot upon his character. In youth he had been industrious and modest—in poverty cheerful and honest—abroad, kind and upright—at home, affectionate and gentle—his old age was like a pleasant summer evening, whose quiet and shaded calmness vies with the bright and fresh charms which usher in the day. He was religious, not bigoted, for he served God truly, and loved his creatures—and when his prayer ascended it sprang from a meek and fervent heart, encumbered with no pompous sectarian feeling, darkened by no shocking prejudice, rash dogmatism, or wicked hypocrisy, but full of mercy, and cherishing in its own core the benevolence which it worshiped in its God.

"Tell me," said the Genius, "how should such a character be regarded?"

"With admiration and with love," I answered; "his noble enterprises should be facilitated—his misfortunes pitied—his errors defended."

"Look into the mirror."

I beheld the interior of a vault beneath a large dwelling-house. Cases of wine were arranged around, and just visible in the dim light of the moon, which penetrated through a narrow grated window.

"This apartment, with its contents," said my companion, "belongs to a friend of the venerable man whom you have just seen. You must prepare for a surprise."

Notwithstanding the notice, I started at beholding the door softly opened and the individual whom I had beheld, and with the whole tenor of whose life and character I was so well acquainted, enter cautiously with a light and basket, which he proceeded to fill with bottles. He finished his task in silence—trod stealthily to the door, and was about to retire when a man sprang upon him suddenly, and roughly seizing him by the shoulders, shouted, "Ah! villain, I have caught you at last." He begged and entreated for mercy, and offered a bribe, if his discoverer would promise not to betray him, but at length yielded to necessity and accompanied him to the police. The report spread like wild-fire through the city. Every body seemed eager to give it circulation, with a kind of triumphant eagerness.

"And what think you, master student?" inquired the Genius.

"I am delighted," I said, "that a hypocrite is unmasked. I have never reposed faith in people who professed to be much better than those around them, and I sincerely trust that his punishment may—"

"This," interrupted the Genius, "is the bad feature in human nature which I would hold up to your attention. There is in almost every bosom a secret envy of the great and good. In the time of their prosperity, this evil passion sleeps. Perhaps they themselves are unconscious of its existence. It is covered over with smiles and congratulations. But when any circumstance occurs to reduce the object nearer to their own level, if any weak point is detected in his character, or any instance wherein temptation has proved too powerful, this dishonorable feeling displays itself in a pleasure so malicious, that it hastens to a judgment without inquiry or examination. It seems to glory in the downfall of a high character, which towered above others and covered them with its shadow. Even they who have shared its friendship and been benefited by its favor, turn against it with an apparent eagerness which does not altogether spring from moral rectitude. Like a shoal of porpoises, which, it is said, no sooner discover a wound upon any of their numbers, than they fall upon him simultaneously, and put an end to his life." "But wherefore," I asked, "shall we not feel indignation against one who has long been enjoying the rewards of virtue without deserving them?"

"A question concerning your own interest would not have been so easily settled," said my companion; "and had you suffered yourself to investigate the matter more closely, you would have detected the deception and found the object of your animadversion still guiltless. The owner of the property which he appears to have stolen, is under the weightiest obligations to him, and, unknown to his servant, gave him the key with which he gained entrance into the chamber, that he might at his leisure avail himself of the contents. The honest, but ignorant domestic, who accidentally observed his motions, was naturally appealed to by him with such arguments as he presumed most likely to be successful, in order to avoid the embarrassment of a public explanation. The agitation which you were so ready to interpret into the agonies of guilt about to be dragged to punishment, was but the horror of innocence shrinking from suspicion—and you are by no means the first who has mistaken the one for the other. This simple circumstance, which is without even a shadow of censure on the part of the apparent malefactor, has been exaggerated into a monstrous crime. So easy is it in this evil-seeking and malevolent world for the record of years spent in toil and virtue to be cancelled in a moment."

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

SKETCHES OF THE CLUB.

We assembled about nine, in the house of Aristarchus. In his youth, this gentleman struggled long with almost overwhelming difficulties. Few have travelled more extensively, or with a more keen insight into the true nature of things. Adversity has taught him to think, necessity compelled him to examine, and his various wanderings over the world have afforded him many facilities for comparing. The result appears in all his opinions and actions. He is never carried away by an impulse. He never confides in a person or an event but upon trial and investigation. And a very complete education and course of reading have placed him in possession of arguments to carry his point, and facts on which to found them. His past adventures have taught him to set a high value on wealth, but not to be proud of it. In his apartments, therefore, although furnished with many objects of rare value and purely ornamental, it is easy to perceive that the selections have been made principally with a view to real advantage. His clock is unencumbered with decoration, but seldom fails in giving the time. His pictures are inclosed in the plainest frames, but are actually choice specimens of the celebrated painters, collected abroad by himself. His piano, although chaste and simple in appearance, has a tone that instantly awakens delightful surprise—and his wine has been several times to India. In personal appearance he is noble. In stature he rises above six feet, and has an erect and military bearing. His limbs betray athletic strength, and his face manly daring, and a narrow observer might detect in his actions and sentiments, as well as in the curling outline of his lip and chin, and the flash of his large dark eyes, a naturally fervid spirit, of quick but strong operation, a full perception of the glowing and deeply beautiful moods of feeling and forms of physical life which, if undisciplined by study, thought, and other accidental causes, would have made him an epicure and a voluptuary.

The youngest of our circle is Appius, with all the other's capacity of feeling, without his habits of examination and restraint. He too, has been a traveller; but he has rather roamed as a poet than observed as a philosopher. A few months spent in Great Britain, a peep into Paris, and a glance of the Rhine, have filled his fancy with rich images and associations.

It will, of course, be understood, that I profess to give only a brief sketch of certain parts of the conversations which occur around me, and the reader will have the goodness to suppose that during the continuance of a dialogue between one couple, the others are equally employed upon some other subject.

On this occasion I was aroused with the contrast discovered between the two described above, upon the state of the New York theatricals, of which I will set down such parts as I remember.

"No foreigner," said Appius, in reply to an observation from Aristarchus, "no foreigner is competent to judge of our performers until after repeated attendances. A first-rate player may be cast in a part not adapted to his powers; a silly one may, by the aid of the author, bear away all the applause. Besides, the excellence of many consists not in their brilliant style of delineating any single character, but in their faculty of shaping themselves to those of the most opposite description. It is from this cause that Mr. Placide requires many trials before his merit is fully appreciated. There is no force, therefore, in the strictures of those who come from the theatres of London, and betray disappointment in witnessing our representations."

"But the great inferiority of our company," said Aristarchus, "consists in the deficiency of the subordinate actors, so that I will venture to say that a New-York audience, however well certain parts have been enacted before them, have rarely witnessed a good play uniformly well sustained, and this is owing to themselves. There are always in the house intelligent individuals, capable of distinguishing the good from the bad; but the audience, as a whole, display the grossest instances, not only of dull perception, but of bad taste. The people in general know little of acting; and I believe if Garrick himself could be revived to play before them, without the aid of his reputation, he would long appeal to nearly empty boxes, until, by the force of his genius, he had not only afforded them a great model, but created a true taste by which that model might be admired. How many a fine reading and perfect attitude take place upon the stage in silence, while the most coarse and tedious songs, the most boisterous and vulgar ranting bring down peals of applause. How many thousand theatre-going people are there in this city who would rather hear Paddy Carey than the overture to Cinderella?"

"And yet," said Appius, "this is not so much a fair test of public taste as a mere exhibition of the different modes by which different classes of society express their approbation. That portion likely to be pleased with rant will be boisterous in their approval; while they who derive gratification from quiet displays of thought, will not manifest it by shouting and clapping their hands."

"But observe," replied the other, "the judgment and taste of the public, as displayed in the degree of patronage bestowed upon the various candidates for their favor, the unnatural excitement to which, on certain occasions, they are easily wrought, and the re-action which carries them to the other extreme. I remember Miss Kelly played some years ago frequently when the house was thronged from the stage lights to the Shakespeare, a striking contrast to the results of her subsequent efforts. She is neither so good nor so bad as she has been represented, and has never been justly estimated."

"But look," rejoined Appius, "at their discrimination in regard to young Burke. This wonderful and beautiful boy has at least met his just appreciation. His talents, his grace, his exquisite taste in music; the force, dignity, and pathos which he imparts to his highest attempts of tragedy; and the extraordinary and inconceivable contrast presented in his comedy, have borne him above all competition. His Richard the Third is replete with fine touches, and, as a whole, is an astonishing effort for any one. When beheld in a child it is doubly wonderful; and his Dennis Brulgruddery and Looney Mactwoler are perfect. He is a prodigy, in the full sense of the word, and as such he is acknowledged."

"And it is this," said Aristarchus, "that I deem censurable, and in which, therefore, I dissent from your opinion. That this child is highly talented and admirably educated, is too well established by his charming performances to admit of any dispute—but he is not a prodigy. This term implies something out of the ordinary course of nature—a giant, a dwarf, or, in respect to mind, a natural development of mental powers, which burst out in defiance of opposition. The American public scarcely ever praise without over-rating. The force of their opinions on nearly all subjects is weakened by an unrestrained spirit of exaggeration. Of this, perhaps, little Burke is a fair instance. In no point of view does he present an attraction equal to a fine opera, or tragic or comic character sustained by a matured actor. The admirable feature in his mind is a facility in learning. Hundreds besides himself possess it. He has insensated nothing; he has struck out no new path of mind; created no new school of taste. His comic performances are delightful, because they are correct imitations by a boy of the thoughts and actions of others. He cannot be a prodigy, because similar instances of apparent precocity are common, and might be more so, if parents were pleased to train intelligent children properly for the stage."

"And are there, then, no mental prodigies?"

"They occur occasionally," replied Aristarchus, "but much less frequently than the world believe. Mozart was one. He composed during his early boyhood; and, from his natural taste, pieces different from all others, which will never be forgotten. He seemed born with some peculiarity of organization. Burke belongs to the highest class of clear-headed, intelligent, or, as the Americans say, talented boys; and from such education could produce a thousand like him. But the world could not, probably, afford more than one or two who could be drilled into any thing like resemblance to Shakespeare or Mozart. Burke has every quality to arouse the affections and please the eye. You love him as a boy, and admire him as an actor; but the excitement which has been wrought up to so high a pitch will soon subside, as it has resulted rather from the love of novelty and the eagerness of curiosity, than a conviction that his exhibitions are more calculated than others to afford permanent pleasure." A MONODY.

THOU wast a great and glorious one,
With soul as radiant as the sun,
And who shall blame thy being not
A sun without a shade or spot,
Since such profane the beauty bright
Of even him, the Lord of light,
To show that imperfection clings
To all but uncreated things!
Some errors and some sins were thine,
And yet thou almost wast divine;
And who reproach shall on thee throw
That thou wast not in all things so?
Enough that in thee we might find
The least imperfect of mankind,
Whatever frailties thou hast known—
Perfection is for God alone.

And thou art dead! ye sons of earth
Your power, your glory, and your worth,
What are they? What avail they all,
Since death could even him enthrall!
And thou art dead! And can it be?
Why, death himself had awe of thee,
When thou hast rushed to his embrace
To grapple with him face to face!
Yet thou art dead! the common lot—
Who can escape, since thou couldst not?

This moment glancing from the tomb
That tells thy narrow bed of gloom,
Upon the skies to fix my sight
I saw the stars in splendor dim,
Yet sweet, through liquid azure swim,
And as their beauty on me beamed,
To whisper to my soul they seemed:
"What wonder man must life resign,
Since even we must cease to shine!"

And not the starry host alone
Must fall before destruction's throne;
The moon, that from the skies embrace
Bends on you like an angel's face,
And even he whose faintest beams
Bathes worlds and worlds in living streams,
In darkness must their bed be made—
What wonder man as low is laid—
That valor cannot death disarm,
Nor even beauty's magic charm—
That warlike arm, and seraph brow,
Must rot in earth, in dust must bow.

"Yet there's a light beneath the sky
That may be dimmed, but cannot die;
Whatever clouds may on it dwell,
The soul is indestructible!
A thousand suns may rise and set,
And leave the soul undying yet;
And to the soul that dwelt in him,
Compared, a thousand suns were dim:
Death had but power upon the frail
Exterior that was its veil,
And when unveiled, it sprang to shine
On high, an orb of light divine,
Compared to whose refulgent play,
A thousand suns were as a ray!"

Why didst thou rise, supreme of men,
Till lost to all but envy's ken?
This was thy crime; for this arose
Millions of petty minds, thy foes;
For this, in thy unhappy hour,
They gave thee to a ruffian power,
Who proudly shook the threatening rod
Above the captive demi-god,
By insect persecutions glad
To sting the noble lion mad,
And poisoning every moment's breath,
To drive thee to despair or death!
Despair had never power to bow
Thy soul—but thou art dead—and how?

And thou art dead—yet e'en the grave
From envy's rancor cannot save:
"Thy god-like crime was to be great,"
Acclaim that wins undying hate!

But thou, oh God! whose holy eyes
No erring passions prejudice,
Thou only knowest all the worth
Of him, thy masterpiece of earth;
And if his errors were not few,
Thou knowest the temptations too.
His virtue, radiant and sublime,
Surpassed what'er he knew of crime;
And had his crimes been far from small,
Thy mercy would surpass them all!

The mercy cruel men denied
He finds from thee, and purified
By thee from every earthly stain,
His spirit shall forever reign,
To glorify the holy name
Of him from whom all glory came.

MYTHOLOGY.

JUNE IN NEW-YORK.

It was the minstrel's merry month of June!
Silent and sultry glowed the breezeless noon;
Along the flowers the bee went murmuring;
Life in its myriad forms was on the wing;
Broke through the green leaves with the quivering beam,
Sung from the grove, and sparkled on the stream.—Buher.

THE sixth month of the modern year is called June, from the Latin junius à junioribus, the younger sort of people; as the name of its predecessor May was derived from maiores, in honor of the "most potent, grave, and reverend seniors" of that period. Our Saxon ancestors called June "meadow-month," because their herds were then turned out to feed in the meadows.

With respect to the weather and the charms of nature we have already expressed a predilection for this month, in preference to her fickle sister May; who, as if in resentment of our remarks, has this year frowned, and vapored, and fretted, and fumed, and wept, and laughed almost every day of her brief existence. Nay, on one occasion, she permitted her ill humor to get so much the better of her characteristic modesty, that she actually scolded like a vixen, and kept some of the good quiet citizens of Gotham awake half the night. This fracas occurred on the night of the nineteenth, (where was Alderman Strong?) just as Apollo was changing horses at the sign of the twins. She has been pretty quiet ever since, though seldom without a cloudy brow.

But June has come, with her bright, smiling, joyous face; blushing, and laughing, and romping, like a country lass in the harvest field.

"She comes, her brows with yellow wheat-ears crown'd,
Her laughing face by heat and toil embrown'd;
She comes, with full and bounteous hand, to bring
All that was promised by the hopeful spring.
'Tis then the long-protracted summer-day
Perfects the crimson blossoms on each spray;
Bids the young fruit with richest juices teem,
And blush and ripen in the solar beam;
Then scarlet strawberries court the eager taste,
And early cherries yield a sweet repast!
While opening flowers, of many a varied dye,
In scented wood and wild delight the eye."

We heartily bid her welcome, and gratefully accept her bounties, for she enters our city with the horn of plenty in her hand, overflowing with rural luxuries; flowers of the richest hues and sweetest fragrance; lots of strawberries, cherries, and green pease; with her various and successive gifts of other fruits, many of them admirably adapted to the purpose of making business for our worthy physicians. Should these not prove sufficiently active, however, in the production of summer cases, ice-cream gardens and cornet-warehouses amply supply the deficiency.

In the country nature now wears her most pleasing garb, while her face is lighted up with a sweet and continued smile, such as often beams from the sunny aspect of some gentle maiden, just bursting from girlishness into the charms of womanhood.

Now, on a moonlight evening, near the margin of some green meadow, through which meanders a sparkling rush-fringed streamlet, it is pleasant to listen to the tuneless serenade of crickets, bull-frogs, tree-toads, and katydids, while the distant wailings of the whippoorwill fall on the ear in sad responses from a neighboring forest. But this has all been "put into verse," and may be read in "the printed volume," of every native rhymester who has had the hardihood to perpetrate such a thing.

As regards saints, holidays, &c. June can claim a few; the first day being sacred to Nicomede, the fifth to Boniface, the eleventh to St. Barnabas, the twenty-fourth to St. John the Baptist, and the twenty-ninth to St. Peter. Neither is this month deficient in memorable events, among which we think it proper to name the following: Joan of Arc was burned for a witch on the fourteenth; Washington was appointed generalissimo of the revolutionary army on the fifteenth; the battle of Bunker's (or rather Breed's) hill took place on the seventeenth; Mahomet died on the eighteenth; our late war with Great Britain was declared on the eighteenth, and hostilities ceased on the eighteenth; the battle of Waterloo was decided on the eighteenth; Akenaide, the celebrated English poet, died on the twenty-third; the battle of Bannockburn occurred on the twenty-fifth; and the battle of Monmouth on the twenty-eighth.

On the twenty-second of this month the sun enters the sign of Cancer.

"The crab sent in by Juno's angry spite,
To vex Alcides in his busy fight,
With the Lernaean Hydra."

A faithful representation of the dreadful combat between Hercules and the Hydra may be seen at the shop-door of every druggist who sells panacea. The story is thus told by the ancients:—the hydra was a monster which infested the neighborhood of Lake Lerna, in Peloponnesus. It had an hundred heads, according to Diodorus; fifty, according to Simonides; and seven, according to the more received opinions of Apollodorus, Hyginus, and others. The destruction of this monster was the second labor of Hercules, who is also called Alcides. He first attacked the many-headed serpent with his arrows, but soon found it necessary to come to close quarters with his club. But, alas! this was productive of no advantage, for no sooner was one head put hors de combat than two others, ten times more wicked than the first, instantly grew up in the place, so that every blow he struck only made more work for poor Hercules. Hence we can at once see the singular propriety of adopting this device for quack medicines; as in curing one complaint, they generally produce two or three new ones. Thus the heads kept increasing in number as the hero of the club continued to "bang away." At length, however, he called his friend Idas to his assistance, who armed himself with a red-hot iron, and whenever Hercules lopped off a head the other immediately applied the iron to the wound, which killed the root, and prevented any after-growth. By this means the monster was soon destroyed, and though the achievement could never have been effected without the aid of Idas, still Hercules has all the credit of it. Such is the way of the world.

But Juno, who, woman-like, must always have "a finger in the pie," (pity it had not been in the crab's claw,) maliciously sought to prevent the success of Hercules, and for that purpose in the midst of the battle sent a sea-crab to bite his foot! This new enemy, however, was quickly dispatched; and Juno, unable to succeed in her attempts to lessen the fame of Hercules, placed the crab among the constellations, where it is now called cancer. Modern authors give a different explanation to this sign of the zodiac. They say, that after the twenty-first of June the days begin to decrease in length, and that the year then begins to recede, or travel backwards like a crab.

June in New-York (we mean the city) is perhaps the most busy and lively month of the year. Our hotels are crowded to excess with strangers from all parts of the United States, more especially from the south; and the West India islands are represented by many of their wealthiest and most respectable merchants and planters. This is the period also at which visitors and adventurers pour upon us in crowds from Europe, as all who come for pleasure embark in May and land here in June. Our theatres and other public places of amusement are now better filled than at any other season of the year, November excepted. The citizens, too, begin to enjoy those agreeable aquatic excursions, for which the location of New-York is so admirably adapted, surrounded, as it is, on all sides with bright waters, and the richest rural scenery; while the fairy grounds of Niblo, like the paradise of Mahomet, is every evening tenanted with houris, and rendered vocal with the sweetest music. New mansions, and even palaces, are seen rising up on every side, with almost as much facility as if produced by the lamp of Aladdin. In short, to adopt the language of a tall friend of ours from the Green mountains, "New-York at the present time, is a pretty considerable smart, lively, busy, darn'd dirty, dusty sort of a kind of a place, I tell you."

FINE ARTS.

MR. GEAR'S CONCERT.

On Friday evening, the twenty-seventh instant, a concert took place at the Masonic-hall, for the benefit of Mr. Gear, lately a chorister of the Chapel Royal and St. Paul's cathedral, London, but at present a professor of music and organist of Grace church, in this city. The school in which Mr. Gear has been educated, joined to assiduity in his profession, and his excellent private deportment, have caused him to meet with general and deserved encouragement; and we were pleased to observe the most respectable among our citizens in attendance. We, however, take leave to object to the mode in which he advertised his concert as being under the patronage of certain individuals, whose names he published. In this country, distinguishing persons for wealth, or what is termed fashion, and placing a public amusement under their immediate "patronage," savors too much of aristocracy and the old world's ways, to be otherwise than offensive to the public generally. It is sufficient that those gentlemen enjoy the fruits of their former industry, with the certainty that a proper, but liberal dispensation of their means, and an encouragement of the arts and sciences, will give them that moral weight in society which is their just right, but which loses its consequence by any assumption of superiority, made either by them or for them.

We proceed now to criticize the concert. Mr. Gear had mustered a formidable array of vocal and instrumental talent, as may be gathered from the following names:

Vocal,
MRS. AUSTIN, | MR. GEAR,
MADAME BRICHTA, | MR. KYLE, SENR. AND
MR. FEHRMAN.
Instrumental,
MR. SEGURA, chef d'orchestre,
MR. W. TAYLOR, first violin,
MESSRS. J. TAYLOR AND GEAR, contra bassi,
HUTTE AND WALKER, violincelli,
CHIOFFI, trombone,
NORTON, trumpet,
NIDS, first horn,
SCHOTT, clarinet.
KYLE, SEN., bassoon,
KYLE, JUN., flute,
Cum multis aliis.

The overture to "Der Freischütz" was played extremely well, but led faster than either the German or English bands usually execute it. Mr. Gear opened the vocal part with the song of William Tell, by Braham. He conceived the author well enough, but was deficient in strength and energy. Mr. Norton played a concerto on the trumpet, and selected such a composition as showed to the best advantage his peculiar forte on that instrument, which is brilliancy of tone and power. In Europe, Harper is esteemed the best professor of the trumpet, and, after him, they place Norton. In delicacy of accompaniment, and in the upper notes, we prefer Harper certainly; but for force, quality of tone, and orchestral playing, Norton has no equal. Madame Brichta's first song was Mozart's Aria, "Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito," accompanied beautifully by Mr. Schott on the clarinet; the slow movement was sung chastely and well; but we cannot justly afford Madame Brichta the praise for this song which we have lately accorded to her exertions elsewhere. In the divisions her execution was by no means real, but rough and staccato, instead of progressing smoothly from note to note. Her second piece was the finale of "La Cenerentola," cut into a solo, and divested of chorus, which she executed very pleasingly. Mrs. Austin sang the scena from "Der Freischütz," of which, as it has been heard so often and with so much pleasure at the Park, we refrain from saying more than that she was in fine voice. The accompaniment was absolutely disgraceful. The chorus were given by the band more like volleys from a raw set of recruits, than the concentrated fire of veterans; added to this, the beautiful legato movement was played by the violins without mutes, (sordine), a mistake of the grossest description. The song, "In bowers of laurel," by Bishop—trumpet obligato—was performed most admirably by Mr. Norton and Mrs. Austin. The union of the voice and trumpet, with the length and graduation of the crescendo and diminuendo, and the power both of the vocalist and instrumentalist created a remarkable effect, and was most enthusiastically applauded. In addition, Mrs. Austin sang the "Soldier's Tear;" a beautiful ballad by Thomas Haynes Bayle, the music by Lee. Mr. Gear, sen. played Handel's air, the "Harmonious Blacksmith," a la Dragonetti, with no particular effect but that of making himself extremely warm. Mr. Fehrman sang a morceau from the "Zauberflöte" pleasingly, and with a great deal of taste. This gentleman is incomparably superior to Signor Dorigo, who figured here for a short time, and, with study, may become a great acquisition to our vocal strength. A duet by Messrs. Kyle and Gear, and the glee, by Callcott, "The Red Cross Knight," made up the sum of the music. We have purposely left the mention of Rossini's celebrated overture, "Guillaume Tell" to the last. We conceive Mr. Gear entitled to the thanks of the musical part of the community for affording them an opportunity of hearing this piece. Notwithstanding it was produced under every disadvantage, it gave general pleasure. It is our duty to point out to the readers of this journal, not only the effects of music, but the causes of those effects. The music of "Guillaume Tell" forms a striking feature in the life of Rossini, as evincing a complete change of style. Here, for the first time, he has quitted his usual mannerism, and adopted not only a different mode of modulation, but assumed a change in the well-known character of his melodies. In taking up the subject of the "Swiss Patriot," he has become a Tyrolien, and engrafted the character of the wild music of the mountains upon the rich stores of his own cultivated Italy—and certainly with great success. If he be not original in this idea, we only know of one example that he can have presented to himself, and that one is Boieldieu, who has adopted a similar course in founding his "Dane Blanche" on an imitation of Scotch melody. The overture commences with a slow movement, written obligato for six violincelli, but, as Mr. Gear could not muster so many without some difficulty, and the number was consequently made up by the addition of tenor violins, of course the effect was not precisely such as could be desired. The second movement has a common Swiss melody of the rans des vaches species for a subject, given, in the original score, to the "Corno Inglese," an instrument of beautiful and peculiar quality, and totally unknown in this country. Mr. Schott played the motivo on the clarinet with that soft and pleasing tone for which he is remarkable; this instrument is soon joined by the flute, and the author works the subject forward and brings in the whole band with stormy and wild passages, a good deal resembling those found in Auber's overture to "Masaniello." The last part—an allegro—or, as it was played, a presto movement, is ushered in by a brilliant trumpet call, and then dashes into a martial air, a kind of quick step, not particular for much originality, but a splendid instance of powerful instrumentation, and admirably adapted to excite and please all kinds of auditors, particularly as the general run of persons delight in noise—and here trumpet, trombone, drums, and triangle create a vast din. The band played this overture delightfully, and received a most enthusiastic encore. Altogether, this concert was one of the best we have attended in America. B.

ENGRAVING.

A very pretty quarto pamphlet has just appeared, published by Peabody & Co., Broadway. It forms the first number of a series of views illustrating New-York and its environs, and, with several pages of letter-press, contains four engravings, viz: view of the city, from Governor's Island, of Broadway from the Park, of the Bowling-green, and of the American-hotel, including the store of the publishers. It is got up in a creditable manner, and, although topographical illustrations are generally dry matters, and, in this particular instance, not likely to throw any extraordinary light on the early affairs of the city, we are told the work meets with a rapid sale.

NEW MUSIC.

J. L. Hewitt, Broadway, has just published, in quite a neat style, the following pieces: the "Bell at sea," words by Mrs. Hemans, music by her sister;—"Here do we meet," written and composed by J. A. Wade;—"Christ our pass-over, is sacrificed for us," composed by Gear;—"The light bark," and "Air from the opera of Giovanni."

THE DRAMA.

All the theatres are at present attractive. Burke continues at the Park to delight full houses. Everybody should see him in the March of Intellect, and Looney Macwtolter in the Review. They are his best efforts, and infinitely superior to his Richard. Cinderella has not yet lost its charms. This favorite opera has undergone several changes in the cast. Mrs. Vernon has succeeded for a short time, in consequence of a domestic affliction, and Mrs. Blake has quitted the theatre. They are both much to be regretted, although the loss is partially supplied by Mrs. Sharpe, whom the public will welcome to her old station in the establishment. We are sorry to add that she was apparently less perfect on the second night of her appearance than her first. She neglected to take up her part of the trio in the chorus of the Prince's followers, in the first act; and discovered the same carelessness in the chorus in the ball-room scene, after the disappearance of Cinderella; and also in the finale to the opera, in all of which Mrs. Blake was heard clearly and distinctly. In the character of Thisbe Mrs. Durie acquits herself remarkably well, "considering the shortness of the notice." It is said that the managers are making great and expensive arrangements to produce the splendid opera of Masaniello with effect for the next season. An organ is to be erected, and large additions made to the already excellent chorus.

The Bowery offers Cagliostro, or the Mysterious Confederates. It was produced and much admired on Monday. Mr. Payne's new tragedy of Oswali of Athens, will be brought forward at the Chatham on Monday evening next, with an original epilogue. Mr. Adams, who is to personate the principal character, has profited by his transatlantic excursion. His Hamlet and Alexander at this theatre drew good houses. As a native actor, in a patriotic play from the pen of an American, he will no doubt attract a full audience. The epilogue, to be spoken in character by Mrs. Hughes, is from the pen of Mr. Woodworth.

STANZAS.

When the twilight's last communion
Is sinking into rest,
And its soft hour of devotion
Sheds its stillness o'er the breast;
When the shadows, slowly darkling,
Call the night-bird to the sea,
Where the starlit streams are sparkling,
I will hie me, love, to thee.

When the evening dews are sealing
The bright eyes of the flowers,
And the scented winds are stealing
Like spirits, through the bowers;
While the weary birds are dreaming
Of sunshine and of glees,
And the vesper star is beaming,
I will hie me, love, to thee.

When the whippoorwill is glancing
Where the sylvan echoes dwell,
And fairy feet are dancing
In the unfrequented dell;
When the moon her light is flinging
O'er the green earth and the sea,
And the mermaid's song is singing,
I will hie me, love, to thee.

When the cricket's notes awaken
'Neath the cottar's peaceful hearth,
And the festive hall is shaken
By its music and its mirth;
While the fire-fly goes a wooing
His mistress o'er the sea,
And the catydid is cooling,
I will hie me, love, to thee.

Believe me, oh! believe me,
I could not love thee less,
Though fortune should deceive me
With many a fond caress;
For my spirit, like a pinion
From cage and clasp set free,
True to first love's dominion,
Would hie it unto thee.

Yes, though with bosom yearning
For home's remembered smiles,
A wanderer, just returning
From ocean's farthest isles—
Ere a father had caressed me,
Or a sister climbed my knee,
Ere a mother's tears had blest me,
I would hie me unto thee.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Dutchman's Fireside. A Novel, now in press. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

THE appearance of an American book, by a native writer, is always to us a subject of peculiar interest, as exhibiting the progress of literature in the United States. The kindness of the publishers of the work at the head of this article, has afforded us an opportunity of perusing it, and we are happy in being enabled thus early to lay before our readers a sample of its merits. Previous to doing this, however, we take occasion to say a few words about the author, who is generally understood to be Mr. Paulding, a name extensively known to this country by a variety of admirable productions.

One of the distinguishing characteristics of the compositions of this gentleman, is an independence of opinion, which, without doubt, has in some measure, injured his general popularity, by placing him occasionally in opposition to the prevailing tastes and fashions of the day. We believe he has never, at any time, sacrificed a principle which he thought to be right, for the purpose of conciliating or flattering any class or denomination of readers. His writings are, moreover, all strictly American—they advocate our institutions, defend our character, and neither court the applauses of foreign critics, by invidious flattery, nor seek to evade their censure by a suppression of his sentiments. We do not recollect a single work of his which is not peculiar for this undeviating devotion to his native land.

This attachment to his country, this fearlessness in asserting its claims, and defending its character and form of government, is, we think, one principal cause that but few of his volumes have been re-published in Europe. They do not suit the tone of that quarter, nor harmonize with the feelings and institutions of monarchy, or the claims to indiscriminate superiority formerly asserted by the reviewers of the old world. They administer neither to the pride of aristocracy, nor the vanity of pretension. In looking over the English periodicals, we see frequent extracts, and occasionally a tale, from his pen; but, as a whole, they are not calculated, and appear not to have been intended, for that market. Those who know with what energy the opinions of foreign critics re-act upon this country, will at once perceive how strongly this neglect and censure of the transatlantic press must have obscured the reputation of this gentleman, in the eyes of those who see only through the spectacles of others.

To us he seems not inferior, in the extent and diversity of his talents, to any American writer of the present school. There is a keen insight into the human character and human motives; a capacity for deep and striking observations, which, mingled as they are, with a racy original humor, and a playful vivacity, may, and undoubtedly sometimes do, escape the ordinary reader. With an air of apparent levity, they combine much of the power of philosophical analysis, and a jest is often found to convey an important moral. His dialogue is full of spirit and colloquial ease, and the total absence of display or affectation. The style of his works is almost as various as the themes he discusses, or the objects he describes; in the "History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan," it is marked by the most naked simplicity; in the "Letters from the South," there are frequent pages of lofty enthusiasm, which we remember to have struck us as exceedingly beautiful; and, generally speaking, it is always happily adapted to the subject. Without being labored, highly polished, or ambitious, it is clear and energetic, occasionally, and we have sometimes thought designedly so, a little careless, as if in wilful opposition to the taste of the times. Though not dealing much in the pathetic, there are touches of feeling which sufficiently indicate that, if he has chosen the walks of humor, it is not from want of power to address the deeper passions. It may however be observed as a fault that his satire is often severe, and his opinions not unfrequently asserted too positively.

We have thought this a proper opportunity to do something like justice to a writer, who is more thoroughly American—whether it be considered a recommendation or a reproach—than any of his more distinguished cotemporaries; and whose reputation has, without doubt, been circumscribed by that circumstance. We will now proceed to notice more particularly the work before us.

The story is a domestic one, and refers, as the author informs us in a short preface, to that period and that state of manners so charmingly delineated by Mrs. Grant, in the "Memoirs of an American Lady." The progress of the plot, however, leads to adventures of a more public and striking nature, and to many stirring scenes, addressing themselves to the admirers of high-wrought romance. The principal object of the writer seems to have been to develop the character of a young man, who, educated in almost total seclusion becomes a great scholar, but at the same time unfit for the business and the intercourse of the world—proud, sensitive, abstracted, and visionary; timid in trifles, yet fearless in acts of great peril—one, who feeling himself awkward in society, imagines everybody is laughing at him. Under this impression he becomes wayward, selfish, and miserable; the destroyer of his own happiness and that of the woman he loves. Being, however, carried through a series of active vicissitudes, the powers of his mind and the energies of his nature gradually develop themselves, and restore him to self-confidence and self-complacency. He is aided in his restoration by the conversation and example of the famous Sir William Johnson. This gentleman resided long among, and obtained a wonderful influence over, the Mohacohs, whose character is finely delineated, and in whose last words to the hero, is couched the moral of the tale—"action, Sybrandt—remember, action."

The story abounds in variety, carrying the reader from the fireside to the wilderness—from the rural field to the scene of battle—and from the society of the savage to the beau monde of New-York, and the little court of the governor, where figure in hoops and brocades the great-grandmothers of the present generation.

It may be proper to state, as explanatory of the chapter we are now about to offer to our readers, that the English and French provincial armies are supposed to be disposed on the shores of Lake Champlain, at some twenty miles distance, the former in their entrenchments at Ticonderoga. The object of the expedition here recorded, is to ascertain the situation, number, and plans of the French.

CHAPTER XIV.

AFTER resting one night at Fort George, they proceeded in boats which were waiting for them down the lake, and in good time arrived at Ticonderoga. Here Sir William turned over the reinforcement he had brought with him to its proper division, and himself took command of the provincials and Indian allies; the latter consisting of the warriors of the Five Nations. The situation of Ticonderoga, or Old T^y, as it is familiarly called, enables it to command the best route between Canada and New-York, and, consequently, it had always been a bone of contention between the French and English, while the former possessed the Canadas and the latter the United States. At the period of which I am now speaking here was assembled the finest army that had hitherto been collected in one body in the new world, as to numbers, discipline, and appointments.

The commander was a brave, experienced, and capable officer; but he knew little of the nature of an irregular warfare in the wilderness against savages and woodmen, and, what was far worse, was too proud to learn. He might have found in Colonel Vancour and Sir William Johnson most able and efficient instructors; but he could not brook the idea of being schooled by provincials, and gloomy were the forebodings of these two experienced gentlemen, during their last conference, that the obstinacy of the commanding general, in applying the tactics of Europe to this warfare of the woods, would be fatal to the expedition, and occasion the defeat, if not the destruction, of this fine army.

Sir William was not a man to be idle in such stirring times, or, indeed, at any time, and he determined that Sybrandt should have little leisure for devouring his own heart in idleness and disappointment. He accordingly detached him on various services; sometimes to gain information of the motions of the enemy, who were said to be advancing in force; sometimes with parties down Lake George to the fort of that name, which was a principal depot of supplies from Albany; and at others to scour the woods in search of vagrant parties of hostile Indians, of whom large numbers were attached to the army of the enemy. In all these services Sybrandt acquitted himself with courage and discretion.

"Bravo," would Sir William exclaim; "you were made for a soldier—to command, not to obey—to lead men, not to be led by a woman. I see I shall make something of you. To night I shall put you to the knife, to try your metal to the utmost."

"I am ready," answered Sybrandt.

"Listen, then," replied Sir William. "Our general is a good soldier and an able officer, so far as mere bravery and an acquaintance with European tactics go. But he is not fit to command here; he is not the Moses to lead armies through the wilderness. He is ignorant of his enemy, and undervalues him; bad, both bad. He has not the least conception that an army of savages may be within twenty feet of him, and he neither see nor hear them. He cannot divest himself of the notion, that they must have baggage-waggons, and horses for their artillery, and depots of provisions, and all the paraphernalia of a regular army on the plains of Flanders. He does not know that an army of savages are neither heard nor seen till they are felt, that they travel like the wind, and with as little incumbrance. He will consequently be taken by surprise, and cut to pieces, unless I and my provincials and redskins make up for his careless folly by our wise vigilance. Now to the point."

"From various indications, which none but an Indian or a backwoodsman can comprehend, I am fully satisfied that the enemy is in much greater force than he chooses to have believed; and this is what I want to be certain of before to-morrow morning, because I have been apprised by the general, that he considers it disgraceful to his majesty's arms to be cooped up in a fort by an inferior enemy. He means to march out in battle array to-morrow, with drums beating, colors flying, and every other device to apprise the enemy of his motion. If he does, it requires not the spirit of prophecy to predict that he will sacrifice, not only the interests of his country, but the lives of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of brave men. The service is perilous; why should I disguise it? It is almost certain death; but you are no common man; nay, I don't flatter you. I would pledge my life on your marching up to the cannon's mouth without winking an eye, if it were necessary. I would go myself on this service, but my rank and the command I hold make it impossible."

"Name the service, Sir William. Life is of little value to me, and if—"

"Pish!" exclaimed the knight, impatiently. "Disgrace of life is an ignoble impulse to heroic actions. I wish you to be animated by the love of your country and the desire of glory. Such motives are alone worthy of the man who risks his life in undertakings of extreme peril."

"Sir William Johnson," replied Sybrandt, proudly, "you are my superior in rank and in merit, if you please, but this gives you no right to insult my feelings, nor am I inclined to submit to it. As a soldier, do with me as you please."

"You are right, young man, and I beg your pardon. Well then, let your motive be what it may; if not ambition, love; both are equally powerful, if not equally noble. If your mistress is true, she will rejoice in your success; if she is false, the most noble revenge you can take will be to make her regret having lost the opportunity of participating in your fame. Give me your hand; are we friends again?"

Sybrandt received it with an acknowledgment of grateful and affectionate respect.

"What escort am I to have?" asked he.

"None; an escort would assuredly betray you. A boat and a man to row it is all I can allow you."

"As you think best; I am satisfied."

Sir William then proceeded to instruct him in the course he was to pursue. To go on this expedition by land would subject him to inevitable discovery. He was, therefore, to be furnished with an Indian canoe, with a single man to paddle it, and under cover of the night, which promised to be sufficiently dark, proceed silently down the narrow strait into Lake Champlain, only so far that he could return with certainty before daylight. He was enjoined not to neglect this; for the narrowness of the strait, lined, as it was without doubt, by parties of skulking Indians, would expose him to certain death, if once seen.

"Should you ascertain the position of the enemy," continued he, "you must depend on your own sagacity, and that of Timothy Weasel, for the direction of your subsequent conduct."

"Timothy Weasel! who is he?"

"What! have you never heard of Timothy Weasel, the Varmonter, as he calls himself?"

"Never."

"Well, then, I must give you a sketch of his story before I introduce him. He was born in New-Hampshire, as he says, and in due time, as is customary in those parts, married, and took possession, by right of discovery I suppose, of a tract of land in what was at that time called the New-Hampshire grants. Others followed him, and in the course of a few years a little settlement was formed of real 'cute Yankees, as Timothy calls them, to the amount of sixty or seventy men, women, and children. They were gradually growing in wealth and numbers, when one night, in the dead of winter, they were set upon by a party of Indians from Canada, and every soul of them, except Timothy, either consumed in the flames or massacred in the attempt to escape. I have witnessed in the course of my life many scenes of horror, but nothing like that which he describes, in which his wife and eight children perished. Timothy was left for dead by the savages, who, as is their custom, departed at the dawn, for fear the news of this massacre might rouse some of the neighboring settlements, in time to overtake them before they reached home. When all was silent, Timothy, who, though severely wounded in a dozen places, only had, as he says, 'been playing 'possum,' raised himself up and looked around him. The smoking ruins, mangled limbs, blood-stained snow, and the whole scene, as he describes it with quaint pathos, is enough to make one's blood run cold. He managed to raise himself upright, and, by dint of incredible exertions, to reach a neighboring village, distant about forty miles, where he told his story, and was then put to bed, where he lay some weeks. In the meantime the people of the settlement had gone and buried the remains of his unfortunate family and neighbors. When Timothy got well, he visited the spot, and while viewing the ruins of the houses, and pondering over the graves of all that were dear to him, solemnly devoted the rest of his life to revenge. He accordingly buried himself in the woods, and built a cabin about twelve miles from hence, in a situation the most favorable to killing the 'kритters,' as he terms the savages. From that time until now he has waged a perpetual war against them, and, according to his own account, sacrificed almost a hecatomb to the manes of his wife and children. His intrepidity is wonderful, and his sagacity in the pursuit of this grand object of his life is beyond all belief. I am half a savage myself; but I have heard this man relate stories of his adventures and escapes, which make me feel myself, in the language of the red-skins, 'a woman,' in comparison with this strange compound of cunning and simplicity. It is inconceivable with what avidity he will hunt an Indian; and the keenest sportsman does not feel a hundredth part of the delight in bringing down his game, that Timothy does in witnessing the mortal pangs of one of the red men.' It is a horrible propensity; but to lose all in one night, and to wake the next morning and see nothing but the mangled remains of wife, children, and all that man holds most close to his inmost heart, is no trifle. If ever mortal had motive for revenge, it is Timothy. Such as he is, I employ him, and find his services highly useful. He is a compound of the two races, and combines all the qualities essential to the species of warfare in which we are now engaged. I have sent for him, and expect him here every moment."

As Sir William concluded, Sybrandt heard a long dry sort of "h-e-e-m-m," ejaculated just outside the door.

"That's he," exclaimed Sir William; "I know the sound. It is his usual expression of satisfaction at the prospect of being employed against his old enemies. Come in, Timothy."

Timothy accordingly made his appearance, forgot his bow, and said nothing. Sybrandt eyed his associate with close attention. He was a tall, wind-dried man, with extremely sharp angular features, and a complexion of course bronzed by the exposures to which he had been subjected for so many years. His canty head of hair was of a sort of sunburnt color; his beard of a month's growth at least, and his eye of sprightly blue never rested a moment in its socket. It glanced from side to side, and up and down, and here and there, with indescribable rapidity, as though in search of some object of interest or apprehensive of sudden danger. It was a perpetual silent alarm.

"Timothy," said Sir William, "I want to employ you to-night."

"H-e-m-m," answered Timothy.

"Are you at leisure to depart immediately?"

"What, right off?"

"Ay, in less than no time."

"I guess I am."

"Very well—that means you are certain."

"I'm always sartin of my mark."

"Have you your gun with you?"

"It's just outside the door."

"And plenty of ammunition?"

"Why, what under the sun should I do with a gun and no ammunition?"

"Can you paddle a canoe so that nobody can hear you?"

"Can't I? h-e-e-m!"

"And are you all ready?"

"I s'pect so. I knew you didn't want me for nothing, and so got all ready."

"Have you any thing to eat by the way?"

"No; if I only stay out two or three days, I shan't be hungry."

"But you are to have a companion."

Timothy here manufactured a sort of linsey-woolsey grunt, betokening disapprobation.

"I'd rather go alone."

"But it is necessary you should have a companion; this young gentleman will go with you."

Timothy hereupon subjected Sybrandt to a rigid scrutiny of those busy eyes of his, that seemed to run over him as quick as lightning.

"I'd rather go by myself," said he again.

"That is out of the question, so say no more about it. Are you ready to go now—this minute?"

"Yes."

Sir William then explained the object of the expedition to Timothy much in the same manner he had previously done to Sybrandt.

"But mayn't I shoot one of them tarnil kritters if he comes in my way?" said Timothy in a tone of great interest.

"No; you are not to fire a gun, nor attempt any hostility whatever, unless it is neck or nothing with you."

"Well, that's what I call hard; but maybe it will please heaven to put our lives in danger—that's some comfort."

The knight now produced two Indian dresses, which he directed them to put on, somewhat against the inclinations of friend Timothy, who observed that if he happened to see his shadow in the water he should certainly mistake it for one of the tarnil kritters, and shoot himself. Sir William then with his own hand painted the face of Sybrandt so as to resemble that of an Indian—an operation not at all necessary to Timothy; his toilet was already made; his complexion required no embellishment. This done, the night having now set in, Sir William, motioning silence, led the way cautiously to one of the gates of Ticonderoga, which was opened by the sentinel, and they proceeded swiftly and silently to the high bank, which hung over the narrow strait in front of the fort. A little bark canoe lay moored at the foot, into which Sybrandt and Timothy placed themselves flat on the bottom, each with his musket and accoutrements at his side, and a paddle in his hand.

"Now," said Sir William, almost in a whisper, "now, luck be with you, boys; remember, you are to return before daylight, without fail."

"But, Sir William," said Timothy coaxingly, "now, mayn't I take a pop at one of the tarnil kritters, if I meet 'em?"

"I tell you, no!" replied the other, "unless you wish to be popped out of the world when you come back. Away with you, my boys."

Each seized his paddle, and the light feather of a boat darted away with the swiftness of a bubble in a whirlpool.

"It's plaguy hard," muttered Timothy to himself.

"What?" quoth Sybrandt.

"Why, not to have the privilege of shooting one of these varmints."

"Not another word," whispered Sybrandt; "we may be overheard from the shore."

"Does he think I don't know what's what?" again muttered Timothy, plying his paddle with a celerity and silence that Sybrandt vainly tried to equal.

The night gradually grew dark as pitch. All became of one color, and the earth and the air were confounded together in utter obscurity, at least in the eyes of Sybrandt Westbrook. Not a breath of wind disturbed the foliage of the trees, that hung invisible to all eyes but those of Timothy, who seemed to see best in the dark; not an echo, not a whisper disturbed the dead silence of nature, as they darted along unseen and unseeing—at least our hero could see nothing but darkness.

"Whisht!" aspirated Timothy, at length, so low that he could scarcely hear himself; and after making a few strokes with his paddle, so as to shoot the boat out of her course, cowered himself down to the bottom. Sybrandt did the same, peering just over the side of the boat, to discover, if possible, the reason of Timothy's manœuvres. Suddenly he heard, or thought he heard, the measured sound of paddles dipping lightly into the water. A few minutes more, and he saw five or six little lights glimmering indistinctly through the obscurity, apparently at a great distance. Timothy raised himself up suddenly, seized his gun, and pointed it for a moment at one of the lights; but, recollecting the injunction of Sir William, immediately resumed his former position. In a few minutes the sound of the paddles died away, and the lights disappeared.

"What was that?" whispered Sybrandt.

"The Frenchmen are turning the tables on us, I guess," replied the other. "If that boat isn't going a-spying just like ourselves, I'm quite out in my calculation."

"What! with lights? They must be great fools."

"It was only the fire of their pipes, which the darkness made look like so many candles. I'm thinking what a fine mark these lights would have been; and how I could have peppered two or three of them, if Sir William had not bin so plaguy obstinate."

"Peppered them! why, they were half-a-dozen miles off."

"They were within fifty yards, the kritters; I could have broke all their pipes as easy as kiss my hand."

"How do you know they were Indians?"

"Why, did you ever hear so many Frenchmen make so little noise?"

This reply was perfectly convincing; and Sybrandt again enjoining silence, they proceeded with the same celerity, and in the same intensity of darkness as before, for more than an hour. This brought them, at the swift rate they were going, a distance of at least twenty miles from the place of their departure.

Turning a sharp angle, at the expiration of the time just specified, Timothy suddenly stopped his paddle as before, and cowered down at the bottom of the canoe. Sybrandt had no occasion to inquire the reason of this action; for happening to look towards the shore, he could discover at a distance innumerable lights glimmering and flashing amid the obscurity, and rendering the darkness beyond the sphere of their influence still more profound. These lights appeared to extend several miles along what he supposed to be the strait or lake, which occasionally reflected their glancing rays upon its quiet bosom.

"There they are, the kritters," whispered Timothy, exultingly; "we've treed 'em at last, I swow. Now, mister, let me ask you one question—will you obey my orders?"

"If I like them," said Sybrandt.

"Ay, like or no like. I must be captain for a little time, at least."

"I have no objection to benefit by your experience."

"Can you play Ingen when you are put to it?"

"I have been among them, and know something of their character and manners."

"Can you talk Ingen?"

"No."

"Ah! your education has been sadly neglected. But come, there's no time to waste in talking Ingen or English. We must get right in the middle of these kritters. Can you creep on all-fours without waking up a cricket?"

"No."

"Plague on it! I wonder what Sir William meant by sending you with me. I could have done better by myself. Are you afraid?"

"Try me."

"Well, then, I must make the best of the matter. They are camped out—I see by their fires—by themselves. I can't stop to tell you every thing; but you must keep close to me, do just as I do, and say nothing; that's all."

"I am likely to play a pretty part, I see."

"Play! you'll find no play here, I guess, mister. Set down close; make no noise; and if you go to sneeze or cough, take right hold of your throat, and let it go downwards."

Sybrandt obeyed his injunctions; and Timothy proceeded towards the lights, which appeared much farther off in the darkness than they really were, handling his paddle with such lightness and dexterity that Sybrandt could not hear the strokes. In this manner they swiftly approached the encampment, until they could distinguish a confused noise of shoutings and halloos, which gradually broke on their ears in discordant violence. Timothy stopped his paddle and listened.

"It is the song of those tarnal Uttawas. They're in a drunken frolic, as they always are the night before going to battle. I know them, for I've popped off a few, and can talk and sing their songs pretty considerably, I guess. So we'll be among them right off. Don't forget what I told you about doing as I do, and holding your tongue."

Cautiously plying his paddle, he now shot in close to the shore whence the sounds of revelry proceeded, and made the land at some little distance, that he might avoid the sentinels, whom they could hear ever and anon challenging each other. They then drew up the canoe into the bushes, which here closely skirted the waters.

"Now leave all behind but yourself, and follow me," whispered Timothy, as he carefully felt whether the muskets were well covered from the damps of the night; and then laid himself down on his face, and crawled along under the bushes with the quiet celerity of a snake in the grass.

"Must we leave our guns behind?" whispered Sybrandt.

"Yes, according to orders; but it's a plaguy hard case. Yet upon the whole it's best; for if I was to get a fair chance at one of them, I believe in my heart my gun would go off clean of itself. But hush! shut your mouth as close as a powder-horn."

After proceeding some distance, Sybrandt getting well scratched by the briars, and finding infinite difficulty in keeping up with Timothy, the latter stopped short.

"Here they are," said he, in the lowest whisper.

"Where?" replied the other, in the same tone.

"Look right before you."

Sybrandt followed the direction, and beheld a group of five or six Indians seated round a fire, the waning lustre of which cast a fitful light upon their dark countenances, whose savage expression was heightened to ferocity by the stimulant of the debauch in which they were engaged. They sat on the ground swaying to and fro, backward and forward, and from side to side, ever and anon passing round the canteen from one to the other, and sometimes rudely snatching it away, when they thought either was drinking more than his share. At intervals they broke out into yelling and discordant songs, filled with extravagant boastings of murders, massacres, burnings, and plunderings, mixed up with threatenings of what they would do to the red-coat long knives on the morrow. One of these songs recited the destruction of a village, and bore a striking resemblance to the bloody catastrophe of poor Timothy's wife and children. Sybrandt could not understand it, but he could hear the quick suppressed breathings of his companion, who, when it was done, aspirated, in a tone of smothered vengeance, "If I only had my gun!"

"Stay here a moment," whispered he, as he crept cautiously towards the noisy group, which all at once became perfectly quiet, and remained in the attitude of listening.

"Hush!" muttered one, who appeared by his dress to be the principal.

Timothy replied in a few Indian words, which Sybrandt did not comprehend; and raising himself from the ground, suddenly appeared in the midst of them. A few words were rapidly interchanged, and Timothy then brought forward his companion, whom he presented to the Uttawas, who welcomed him and handed the canteen, now almost empty.

"My brother does not talk," said Timothy.

"Is he dumb?" asked the chief of the Uttawas.

"No; but he has sworn not to open his mouth till he has struck the body of a long knife."

"Good," said the other, "he is welcome."

After a pause he went on, at the same time eyeing Sybrandt with suspicion; though his faculties were obscured by the fumes of the liquor he still continued to drink, and hand round at short intervals.

"I don't remember the young warrior. Is he of our tribe?"

"He is; but he was stolen by the Iroquois many years ago, and only returned lately."

"How did he escape?"

"He killed two chiefs while they were asleep by the fire, and ran away."

"Good," said the Uttawas: and for a few moments sunk into a kind of stupor, from which he suddenly roused himself, and grasping his tomahawk started up, rushed towards Sybrandt, and raised his deadly weapon, stood over him in the attitude of striking. Sybrandt remained perfectly unmoved, waiting the stroke.

"Good," said the Uttawas again: "I am satisfied; the Uttawas never shuts his eyes at death. He is worthy to be our brother. He shall go with us to battle to-morrow."

"We have just come in time," said Timothy. "Does the white chief march against the red-coats to-morrow?"

"He does."

"Has he men enough to fight them?"

"They are like the leaves on the trees," said the other.

By degrees Timothy drew from the Uttawas chief the number of Frenchmen, Indians, and coureurs de bois which composed the army; the hour when they were to commence their march, the course they were to take, and the outlines of the plan of attack, in case the British either waited for them in the fort or met them in the field. By the time he had finished his examination, the whole party, with the exception of Timothy, Sybrandt, and the chief, were fast asleep. In a few minutes after, the two former affected to be in the same state, and began to snore lustily. The Uttawas chief nodded from side to side, then sunk down like a log, and remained insensible to every thing around him, in the sleep of drunkenness.

Timothy lay without motion for a while, then turned himself over, and rolled about with apparent unconsciousness, managing to strike against each of the party in succession. They remained fast asleep. He then cautiously raised himself, and Sybrandt did the same. In a moment Timothy was down again, and Sybrandt followed his example without knowing why, until he heard some one approach, and distinguished, as they came nigh, two officers, apparently of rank. They halted near the waning fire, and one said to the other in French, in a low tone:

"The beasts are all asleep; it is time to wake them. Our spies are come back, and we must march."

"Not yet," replied the other; "let them sleep an hour longer, and they will wake sober."

They then passed on, and when their footsteps were no longer heard, Timothy again raised himself up, motioning our hero to lie still. After ascertaining by certain tests which experience had taught him, that the Indians still continued in a profound sleep, he proceeded with wonderful dexterity and silence to shake the priming from each of the guns in succession. After this, he took their powder-horns and emptied them; then taking up the tomahawk of the Uttawas chief, which he had dropped from his hand, he stood over him for a moment, with an expression of deadly hatred which Sybrandt had never before seen in his or in any other countenance. The intense desire of killing one of them, struggled a few moments with his obligations to obey the orders of Sir William; but the latter at length triumphed, and motioning Sybrandt, they crawled away with the silence and celerity with which they came; lunched their canoe, and plied their paddles with might and main.

"The morning breeze is springing up," said Timothy, "and it will soon be daylight. We must be tarnal busy."

And busy they were, and swiftly did the light canoe slide over the wave, leaving scarce a wake behind her. As they turned the angle which hid the encampment from their view, Timothy ventured to speak a little above his breath.

"It's lucky for us that the boat we passed coming down has returned, for it's growing light apace. I'm only sorry for one thing."

"What's that?" asked Sybrandt.

"That I let that drunken Uttawas alone. If I had only bin out on my own bottom, he'd have bin stun dead in a twinkling, I guess."

"And you too, I guess," said Sybrandt, adopting his peculiar phraseology; "you would have been overtaken and killed."

"Who, I? I must be a poor kritter if I can't dodge half-a-dozen of these drunken varmints."

A few hours of sturdy exertion brought them at length within sight of Ticonderoga, just as the red harbingers of morning striped the pale green of the skies. Star after star disappeared, as Timothy observed, like candles that had been burning all night and gone out of themselves, and as they struck the foot of the high bluff whence they had departed, the rays of the sun just tipped the peaks of the high mountains rising towards the west. Timothy then shook hands with our hero.

"You're a hearty kritter," said he, "and I'll tell Sir William how you looked at that tarnal tomahawk as if it had been an old pipe-stem."

Without losing a moment, they proceeded to the quarters of Sir William, whom they found watching for them with extreme anxiety. He extended both hands towards our hero, and eagerly exclaimed,

"What luck, my lads? I have been up all night, waiting your return."

"Then you will be quite likely to sleep sound to-night," quoth master Timothy, unbending the intense rigidity of his leathern countenance. "I am of opinion if a man wants to have a real good night's rest, he's only to set up the night before, and he may calculate upon it with sartinty."

"Hold your tongue, Timothy," said Sir William, good-humoredly, "or else speak to the purpose. Have you been at the enemy's camp?"

"Right in their very bowels," said Timothy.

Sir William proceeded to question, and Sybrandt and Timothy to answer, until he drew from them all the important information of which they had possessed themselves. He then dismissed Timothy, with cordial thanks and a purse of yellow boys, which he received with much satisfaction.

"It's not of any great use to me, to be sure," said he, as he departed; "but some how or other I love to look at the kritters."

"As to you, Sybrandt Westbrook, you have fulfilled the expectations I formed of you on our first acquaintance. You claim a higher reward; for you have acted from higher motives, and with at least equal courage and resolution. His majesty shall know of this; and, in the mean time, call yourself Major Westbrook, for such you are from this moment. Now go with me to the commander-in-chief, who must know what you heard and saw."

HALLEY'S COMET OF THE YEAR 1834.

THERE are few comets which are visible to the naked eye, and on this account the one, whose return figures among the calculated memorabilia of the year 1834, is entitled to an early and special notice. Of the heavenly creations of its own class, it is of this one that it can be predicted with the greatest certainty, that it travels round the sun, and that we are accurately acquainted with the period of its revolution—facts which are the result of four several opportunities which the world has enjoyed of watching its course. Such are the considerations which justify and induce me to take a glance at its history.

So far as modern observations reach, this comet was seen, for the first time, in the year 1465, and it approached to a distance of eleven millions seven hundred thousand miles from the sun, on the eighth of June in that year. It came near the earth, and under very favorable circumstances, presenting itself with peculiar splendor and remarkable brilliancy, travelling with a tail which extended over a third portion of the firmament, and affording a spectacle of far greater beauty than it has ever exhibited since those times.

Its next appearance was in 1531; and, on the twenty-fifth day of August, it was at a distance of eleven millions six hundred thousand miles from the sun. The period of its revolution was, therefore, ascertained to be seventy-five years, two months, and seventeen days. Its appearance differed greatly from that just described. Appian, who observed it, relates that it had no tail whatever, but was what is termed a bearded comet—its whole circumference being encircled by an equal effulgence at every point; and, inasmuch as this halo had no defined edging, it appeared to be hairy or bearded. It may have had a tail, though, from the unfavorable circumstances which accompanied the comet's appearance on this occasion, it was not discernible by the naked eye.

Calculating each of its revolutions at seventy-five years, the return of this comet might have been predicted for the year 1606 or 1607; and, in fact, it did return, for the third time, in 1607. It approached nearest to the sun on the twenty-sixth of October, when it was eleven million seven hundred and fifty thousand miles distant from it. The period of its revolution had consequently been seventy-six years, two months, and one day—one twelvemonth longer than the preceding; whence, it is obvious, that its progress had been disturbed by some planet, or other strange body. It was of considerable magnitude, its head being of the size of the planet Jupiter; but its light was weak and nebulous; it had a long tail, and this was also feeble in its rays, as if overcast with vapors. The revolution of this comet having been of seventy-five or seventy-six years' duration, it followed, that its return would occur in 1682 or 1683.

This calculation was confirmed by its re-appearance in 1682, when its nearest approximation to the sun took place on the fourteenth of September, on which day it was distant from it eleven millions, six hundred and fifty thousand miles. It was now, for the first time, observed, with any degree of accuracy, by Halley, from whom it has consequently been denominated "Halley's Comet." This astronomer compared the result of his several observations with those made on the comets of the year 1607 and 1531, and found them closely to correspond with one another; from which he was led to infer that the three appearances belonged to one and the same body. On this occasion, its revolution amounted to seventy-four years, ten months, and eighteen days—giving a mean duration of seventy-five years and a half.

Halley predicted the return of the comet in the year 1759; at first, however, it seemed as if the event would not realize the prediction, as the comet was tardy in appearing; but, to the delight of every astronomer, it became visible at last, and put an end to the doubt which had hitherto existed as to the durable nature of such bodies as comets. It attained its solar elevation on the thirteenth of March, when its distance from the sun was eleven million six hundred and fifty thousand miles, and was of inferior size to what it had been on its last appearance. Its tail was but lightly illuminated, and not discernible, except when the sky was clear; on which account no precise judgment could be formed of its length; the weakness of its irradiation was principally owing to its unfavorable position. Its last revolution had been seventy-six years and six months.

It may reasonably be asked, why the comet consumed a whole twelvemonth more in its revolution than was natural to it? To this it may be answered, and upon very accurate calculation, that it first displayed itself close upon the planet Jupiter, which influenced and retarded its movement. Hence it appeared at a somewhat later period than Halley had foretold.

The return of the comet in our own days ought to take place in the year 1834; but it is possible it may be so influenced by Saturn and Uranus, as not to make its appearance before 1835, or even 1836. Numberless calculations have already been formed on this event; and we must leave it to time to pronounce which of them is correct. Neither can we predetermine what will be the degree of its brilliancy or the extent and splendor of its tail; these are matters which seem to depend on circumstances beyond the sphere of our present knowledge.

Colonel Nathaniel Rochester.—The death of this venerable and much respected patriot has called forth innumerable biographies, uniting in terms of praise. He was born in Virginia, on the twenty-first of February, 1752. In August, 1775, he commenced his legislative career as a member of the provincial convention of North Carolina. From this convention his first commission as major of militia emanated; and the rapid progress of hostilities did not leave the young soldier long without an opportunity of signalizing himself. The immediate call upon his services resulted from the secret mission of the British general, Alexander McDonald, to the Highland Scotch in Cumberland county—refugees from their native land, for adherence to the disastrous fortunes of the Pretender. The schemes of this officer were executed so carefully, that before his intentions were known one thousand men had been raised and were marching to Wilmington. When intelligence of this reached Hillsborough, Colonel Thackston immediately went in pursuit to Fayetteville, (then called Cross-creek.) The enemy had left before they arrived, when Major Rochester was despatched by his commanding officer to overtake them by forced marches, before General McDonald should gain the transports, waiting at the mouth of Cape Fear river, to convey them to New-York. At day-break, after a march of twenty miles, the general and five hundred of his Scotch recruits were met on the retreat, having been turned at Moore's-creek bridge by Colonel Caswell, afterwards the first governor of the state. Major Rochester captured the whole—but from scarcity of provisions was compelled to release all but about fifty officers—binding the discharged not to serve during the war against the colonies. On his return to head-quarters, he found that Colonel Alexander Martin, of the Salisbury minute-men, had arrived with two thousand men, and to him the credit of the capture is by mistake ascribed by Chief-justice Marshal, in his Life of Washington. His services to the village which bears his name were great and disinterested, and few have lately departed from the stage of life more deservedly lamented.

Skrzynecki and Diebitsch.—The following sketches of these distinguished military chieftains—the one copied from a letter of an English paper's Warsaw correspondent, and the other from an article in the London Athenæum—will be perused with much interest at the present time.

"General John Skrzynecki was born in Gallacia, in 1787, and studied at Leopold. When the French armies entered Poland in 1806, Skrzynecki, then nineteen, left his father's house, and enlisted in the first regiment of infantry, commanded by colonel Kassimer Malachowski, now general of division, who lately covered himself with so much glory. At the opening of the memorable campaign of 1809, in the Grand Duchy of Warsaw, under Prince Joseph Poniatowski, Skrzynecki was raised to the rank of captain in the sixteenth regiment, then formed by Prince Constantine Czarforyski. In the campaign of Moscow, in 1812, he was appointed chief of battalion; and in 1813 and 1814 he gave repeated proofs of his talent and intrepidity. It was in the hollow square of his battalion that Napoleon took shelter at Arcis-sur-Aube, when the regiments of the young guard gave way. The Polish soldiers transferred the precious deposit to the French corps, which arrived soon after, and Skrzynecki charging the enemy, under the eyes of the emperor, beat them back with considerable loss. Appointed knight of the legion of honor, and of the military order of Poland, Skrzynecki returned to his country with the remnants of the Polish troops, and obtained the command of the eighth regiment of infantry, in the second brigade of general Ignazio Blumer, the same who received eighteen balls through his body on the night of the twenty-ninth of November. Skrzynecki has distinguished himself on several occasions since the commencement of the present campaign, and his brilliant conduct in the great battles of February have raised him to the highest distinction."

"Field-marshal Count Diebitsch is a little, fat, plethoric-looking man, something less than five feet high; he has a very large head, with long black hair, small piercing eyes, and a complexion of the deepest scarlet, alike expressive of his devotion to cold punch, and of a certain irascibility of temper which has elicited from the troops, to his proud title of Kabalcansky, or the Trans-Balkanian, the additional one of the Semavar, or the tea-kettle. I have said that Count Diebitsch owes his fortunes to his face; the sequel will show how. He is the second son of a Prussian officer, who was in the staff of Frederick. At an early age he entered the Russian army, and obtained a company in the imperial guard. It was at this time that the king of Prussia came on a visit to the Russian autocrat, and it so happened that it was Captain Diebitsch's tour of duty to mount guard on the royal visitor. The emperor foresaw the ridiculous figure the little captain would cut at the head of the tall grenadiers, and desired a friend to hint to him that it would be agreeable to his imperial majesty if he would resign the guard to a brother officer. Away goes the friend, meets the little captain, and bluntly tells him that the emperor wishes him not to mount guard with his company, for, added he, 'l'empereur dit, et il faut convenir, que vous avez l'extérieur terrible.' This 'delicate hint,' that his exterior was too terrible to be seen at the head of troops not remarkable for good looks, so irritated the future hero of the Balkan, that with his natural warmth of temper he begged to resign, not his tour of duty only, but the commission he held in the Russian army; and being a Prussian, and not a Russian subject, desired to be allowed to return to his native country. The Emperor Alexander, who appears to have formed a just estimation of his talents, easily found means to pacify him by giving promotion in the line. He subsequently made himself so useful in that part of the service where beauty was not indispensable, that the late emperor placed him at the head of the general staff, which situation he held when the reigning emperor appointed him to succeed Count Wittgenstein in the chief command."

Musical.—The celebrated violinist, Paganini, is about to proceed to London. It is said that the most enthusiastic eagerness prevails to witness his extraordinary performances. His ardor in executing a piece is so great as to leave him at its close totally exhausted. A Paris paper mentions that Madame Malibran, "the highly-gifted but somewhat capricious cantatrice," was heard to say, that great as was his skill she lamented his inability to perform a cantabile. Upon hearing which the ambitious artist challenged her to select the most difficult song from any composer; adding, that he would wait upon her before the audience, there cut any three strings which she should designate from his instrument, and thus perform, violin versus voice. We have not heard the results of this singular cartel. The same paper states that he was in the gardens of the Tuilleries in the evening, but was so pressed upon by the crowd that he was compelled to retire. Rossini was in Madrid on the thirteenth of February last. On the evening of his arrival the Italian company gave the "Barber of Seville," announcing in the bills that it was "performed in honor of the great composer's presence in the Spanish metropolis." A box had been reserved for him alone, but, in deference to the king's visit, he declined it, and took his seat in the orchestra, where he directed the opera in propria persona. A foreigner present adds, "no words can describe the enthusiasm with which he was received. After the performance of 'Il Barbiere' was over, and Rossini had reached his night's quarters, the two hundred performers of the Chapel Royal sallied out, and gave him a serenade."

The Union.—A correspondent of the Columbia Inquirer uses the following language—"I say, and I say it boldly, this Union cannot—ought not to last." Many, unacquainted with the high state of excitement to which the political feeling of the south has been wrought up, will deem this the rant of an intemperate enthusiast, or the blustering of some disappointed office hunter, and be, therefore, inclined to pass it over as unworthy of notice. It assumes a more serious importance, when, as is really the case, this startling cry bursts from the lips of men of talents, standing, and education; of editors, legislators, judges, and professors of repute in seminaries of learning. Should this disgraceful recklessness of the interest and glory of the nation, and of those wise principles which her greatest and best have laid down for her preservation, be long continued, an American, instead of treading proudly among the tottering institutions and feudal shadows of foreign countries, as the representative of a land where all is firm, bright, and happy, will blush to show his face abroad. We are, however, far from fearing any actual danger from the idle zeal of a few impetuous leaders of a party. The shame and disadvantage of dissolution are yet too glaringly obvious, the policy and glory of union are too clearly understood by the mass of the people to permit of their being influenced by the sophistry and irritability of this set of inflammable apostates from the cause of their country. When our population shall have increased tenfold, when there shall be an aristocracy of wealth, and a religious party in politics, perhaps the fabric of freedom reared here in the wilds of the west, may tremble from its deep foundations and crumble into ruins; but the American character, as well as American prospect, must undergo a radical change; the population must spread out and fill the vast tracts between the oceans, till they grow too immense and powerful for the bonds which now hold them together; and long before that period these zealots, who, from some paltry consideration of business profit, some tax upon woollen or iron ware, are laboring to anticipate the downfall of the republic, shall have passed away, and their very tombs be forgotten.

School-boy wit.—A gentleman, now well known to the public, when at a preparatory school, was, with his companions at dinner, ordered to consume all on their plates, fat as well as lean. It was with the greatest difficulty that he disposed of that nauseous part of his daily meal. Whenever it was practicable he would slide it into his pocket-handkerchief, and so get rid of it. One day, however, we perceived to our mutual horror that we were to be fellow-devourers of an exceedingly obese breast of mutton. Our stomach really sickened at the mere sight of it; he, poor fellow, liked it as little, but showed in his countenance a determination not to comply with the invariable cry of "eat your fat, boys, eat your fat." We looked at him with some degree of astonishment as he piled the objectionable morsels around the rim of his plate, with an apparent composure that attracted the attention of our omnivorous master. "Why don't you eat your fat, sir?" said he. "Because," replied George, "the poet says we are to eat nothing but lean." "The poet," returned our master vociferously, "what poet ever made use of such an absurd expression, sir? Come, tell me, or I will flog you for your impertinence?" "Sir," answered George, (confident of his authority,) "Horace says,

"*Vacuis committere venis,
Nil nisi lenē decet*"

Good advice.—"Arrah, my jewel," said an honest fellow from the Emerald isle, the other day, to the cider, whose passage from a narrow-necked bottle he was vainly endeavoring to expedite, "arrah now, my jewel! don't come quite so fast jist, dear, and then you'll come a great dale faster." A remark although, peradventure, not founded on very deep philosophical reflection, yet capable of an application as extensive as Dr. Franklin's story of the whistle.

'Tis the hour when happy faces
Smile around the taper's light;
Who will fill our vacant places?
Who will sing our songs to-night?
Through the mist that floats above us,
Faintly sounds the vesper bell,
Like a voice from those who love us,
Breathing, fondly, "fare thee well!"

THIRD VERSE.

When the waves are round me breaking,
As I pace the deck alone,
And my eye in vain is seeking
Some green leaf to rest upon;
What would I not give to wander
Where my old companions dwell?
Absence makes the heart grow fonder,

LITERARY.

THE Brothers Harper are about incorporating in their Family Library the works of those dramatists who flourished in the time of Shakspeare. There can be little doubt that they will be eagerly purchased, as they are very much wanted in this country. Although containing the essence of poetry, few on this side of the Atlantic are acquainted with their merits. It is singular that they have not been re-printed here before. Indeed, while ignorant of the intention of the Harpers, we had ourselves sketched a little plan for enriching the pages of the Mirror with the choicest passages, in the form of essays upon the beauties of the old poets. A little of the solid thought and labored composition of those days might be advantageously substituted for much of the frippery now cut down into tedious metre, and eked out with forced and hacknied rhyme. These industrious publishers have also in the press a series of volumes, entitled "Library of Select Novels," a term which sufficiently explains their object. In this way the admirers of fictitious compositions will be furnished at a very moderate rate, with the spirit of the modern American and English press. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the benefits which their enterprise will confer upon a popular branch of literature, and their name is a sufficient guarantee for correctness in the typographical department. The first of the series already issued is Cyril Thornton, a novel which has successfully passed through the ordeal, and is too well known to require present comment. The next will consist of Mr. Paulding's new novel, entitled the "Dutchman's Fireside." They have also in the course of publication a series of works calculated to form a complete "Family Classical Library," in a cheap, handsome, and uniform size, and embracing correct and elegant translations of the most esteemed authors of Greece and Rome; and it is intended to issue, in a new and concentrated form, a set of standard English authors, under the title of an "Epitome of English Literature." Among others, the early part of their series will embrace the productions of Burnet, Clarendon, Gibbon, Hume, Robertson, Bacon, Locke, Paley, Addison, Goldsmith, Johnson, Swift, &c. They will be edited by A. J. Valpy, M. A. It is to be hoped, however, that they will not be too much abridged. A new, cheap, and elegant American edition of Bourrienne's private memoirs of Napoleon, have just been issued by Carey and Lea, in two octavo volumes. Notwithstanding certain alleged inaccuracies, on points of minor consideration, the authenticity of these statements, as a whole, is almost universally conceded. A new collection of fugitive poetic pieces, by Mrs. Hemans, from the same press, is also before us. We shall notice both more at length in our next.

Carter, Hendee, and Babcock, of Boston, have published "Travels in Malta and Sicily, with Sketches of Gibraltar, in 1827." It is a formidable octavo of five hundred and twenty-eight pages.

OPINION.

It is curious to observe the striking difference of opinion which exists between the most intelligent minds. How frequently it is alleged, especially against modern historians, that their representations of the times in which they lived, and the quorum pars magna fui scenes of their own day, should not be received with too much credulity, as it could not be presumed that one engaged in the turmoil, actuated by the prejudices, party feelings, and innumerable selfish interests of surrounding occurrences, could distinctly and impartially describe them. "That great work," says the last number of the North-American Review, speaking of Scott's Napoleon, "has not satisfied the demand of the world, but we presume no living writer could have given equal satisfaction; and, the truth is, that the gigantic character he describes is still too near us to be painted; we must wait till the lights and shadows are blended into their right proportions, by time and distance."

"William Tyre," says an author in the Harpers' Family Library, respecting one of the historians of the crusade, "was not born at the time of the first crusade; and, consequently, when he speaks of the events of that enterprise, we may look upon him as clear, talented, and elegant; but we must not expect to find the vivid identity of contemporaneous writing."

We should be pleased if some one of our correspondents would favor us with a treatise, touching the distance from the time when the events which he intends to describe took place, most likely to afford the historian a correct view of his subject; or the degree of intimacy which should subsist between a great man and his biographer, by which all the secret influences and peculiarities of organization and feelings might be thoroughly understood, yet without danger of extenuating or exaggerating faults, of magnifying virtues, or explaining them away, as beheld through the medium of hate or friendship.

REGRETS.

ALAS! my hair is turning gray,
My limbs are growing slender;
I find my heart too, day by day,
Becoming very tender;
My bosom's lord sits on his throne
With an unusual lightness;
And the gay world has never shone
With half its present brightness.

Ah! I have been a thoughtless youth,
To sport so with affections;
To promise so much deathless truth,
And break such rich connections;
To hurry on from fair to fair,
From one love to another,
And to be welcome every where—
But only as a brother!

I might have married years ago,
Some fair and wealthy lady,
But now my light is burning low,
And life is growing shady;
My single friends have left my side,
To wed their half a million,
With some quite pretty partner bride,
To dance through life's cotillion.

I speak, but fair ones do not stay,
As once they did, but shun me;
No eyes grow bright with melting ray,
When resting soft upon me;
No bosom beats beneath its lace,
Its gentle thoughts to smother;
No angel shows a troubled face,
When I address another!

Even thus it is, though on my life
I cannot guess the reason;
I must live on without a wife
Through my appointed season.
In single blessedness must go
Where they will shortly lay me,
With not a creature willing to

LITERARY NOTICES.

The History of Chivalry. By G. P. R. James, Esq.; author of "De L'Orme," "Darnley," "Richelieu," etc. 18mo. p. 342. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1861.

THIS is the title of the twentieth number of "Harper's Family Library." We need say little on a subject so associated with the most interesting portions of history, and dazzling pictures of romance. It must equally arouse the curiosity, awaken the fancy, and elevate the feelings. In the very first vow required of the aspirants to chivalry, in its earliest state, there is something that stirs the loftiest passions and ennoble the soul; and the reader, who has caught any of the high spirit of the ages here described, will scarcely repress a thrill, as his imagination paints the proud and daring knight starting forth upon the arena of life, so crowded with the demons of rapine, murder, and oppression, and calling heaven to witness that he would "Speak the truth, succor the helpless, and never turn his back upon an enemy."—What a beautiful appendage to this vow is the character given of the knights by Charles Nodier, for a long time after the first institution of chivalry. "Simple in their clothing, austere in their morals, humble after victory, and firm under misfortune."

Events which have already elicited so many brilliant delineations from historians, poets, and writers of romances—which have been paraded in all the forms of truth, and decorated with every embellishment of fancy, now require the touch of a master-hand to render their details tolerable. Of such an one, we are pleased to state that the present treatise bears very satisfactory evidence. Mr. James is a writer of much force. He has succeeded in compressing within a narrow space a valuable mass of information. Neither are his accounts huddled carelessly together as mere extracts from other works, but, in availing himself of preceding authors, he has arranged their facts with an intelligence and spirit of his own, and connected them with such clear and explanatory sketches, as render his production a lucid, sensible, and interesting exposition of the rise, reign, and fall of chivalry, which even every ordinary reader should procure without delay. The mind experiences no weariness in going through its pages, but is perpetually excited by a recurrence of animated scenes, expressed in scholar-like and gentlemanly language, and interspersed with sentences of more than ordinary eloquence. Perhaps, without hypercriticism, a few instances of careless inaccuracies might be pointed out in the style; but the whole tenor of the history is so good, and it is so obviously calculated to render important and serious subjects attractive to youth, and thereby to supplant mere unmeaning and trashy works of fiction, which too often enervate their taste and bias their character, that we waive all minor objections, lay down our spectacles, rule, compass, and stop-watch, and at once recommend the work to the favorable notice of the public. As the most direct method of proving both the sincerity and the justice of our phrase, we shall append several extracts. The following is a succinct and graphic account of the origin of the institution which has exercised such an important influence over human affairs:

"Charlemagne expired like a meteor that, having broken suddenly upon the night of ages, and blazed brilliantly over a whole world for a brief space, fell, and left all in darkness, even deeper than before. His dominions divided into petty kingdoms—his successors waging long and inveterate wars against each other—the nations he had subdued shaking off the yoke—the enemies he had conquered avenging themselves upon his descendants—the laws he had established forgotten or annulled—the union he had cemented scattered to the wind—in a lamentably brief space of time, the bright order which his great mind had established throughout Europe was dissolved. Each individual, who, either by corporeal strength, advantageous position, wealth, or habit, could influence the minds of others, snatched at that portion of the divided empire which lay nearest to his means, and claimed that power as a gift which had only been intrusted as a loan. The custom of holding lands by military service had come down to the French from their German ancestors, and the inferior officers, who in former days had led the armies, or commanded in the provinces as servants of the crown, now arrogated to themselves hereditary rights in the charges to which they had been intrusted; and, in their own behalf, claimed the feudal service of those soldiers to whom lands had been granted, instead of preserving their allegiance for their sovereigns. The weak monarchs, who still retained the name of kings, engaged in ruinous wars with each other, and in vain attempts to repel the invasions of the Northmen, or Normans, first tolerated these encroachments, because they had at the time no power of resisting, and then gradually recognised them as rights, upon the condition that those who committed them should assist the sovereign in his wars, and acknowledge his title in preference to that of any of his competitors.

"Thus gradually rose the feudal system from the wrecks of Charlemagne's great empire. But still all was unstable and unconfirmed; the limits of the different powers in the state undecided and variable, till the war of Paris, the incompetence of the successors of Charlemagne, and the elevation of Hugues Capet, the count of Paris, to the throne, showed the barons the power they had acquired, and crowned the feudal compact by the creation of a king whose title was found in it alone.

"Great confusion, however, existed still. The authority of the sovereign extended but a few leagues round the city of Paris; the Normans ravished the coast; the powerful and the wicked had no restraint imposed upon their actions, and the weak were everywhere oppressed and wronged. Bands of plunderers raged through the whole of France and Germany, property was held by the sword, cruelty and injustice reigned alone, and the whole history of that age offers a complete medley of massacre, bloodshed, torture, crime, and misery.

"Personal courage, however, had been raised to the highest pitch by the very absence of every thing like security. Valor was a necessity and a habit, and Eudes and his companions, who defended Paris against the Normans, would have come down as demigods to the present day, if they had but possessed a Homer to sing their deeds. The very Normans themselves, with their wild enthusiasm and supernatural daring, their poetical traditions, and magnificent superstitions, seemed to bring a new and extraordinary light into the very lands they desolated. The plains teemed with murder, and the rivers flowed with blood: but the world was weary of barbarity, and a re-acting spirit of order was born from the very bosom of confusion.

"It was then that some poor nobles, probably suffering themselves from the oppression of more powerful lords, but at the same time touched with sincere compassion for the wretchedness they saw around them, first leagued together with the holy purpose of redressing wrongs and defending the weak. They gave their hands to one another in pledge that they would not turn back from the work, and called upon St George to bless their righteous cause. The church readily yielded its sanction to an institution so noble, aided it with prayers, and sanctioned it with a solemn blessing. Religious enthusiasm became added to noble indignation and charitable zeal; and the spirit of chivalry, like the flame struck forth from the hard steel and the dull flint, was kindled into sudden light by the savage cruelty of the nobles, and the heavy barbarity of the people."

"In France, I believe, the order first took its rise; and, probably, the disgust felt by some pure minds at the gross and barbarous licentiousness of the times, infused that virtuous severity into the institutions of chivalry which was in itself a glory. If we may give the least credit to the picture of the immorality and luxury of the French, as drawn by Abbon, in his poem on the siege of Paris, no words will be found sufficient to express our admiration for the men who first undertook to combat not only the tyranny but the vices of their age; who singly went forth to war against crime, injustice, and cruelty; who defied the whole world in defence of innocence, virtue, and truth; who stemmed the torrent of barbarity and evil; and who, from the wrecks of ages, and the ruins of empire, drew out a thousand jewels to glitter in the armor upon the breast of knighthood.

"For long the christian religion had struggled alone, a great but shaded light through the storms of dark and barbarous ages. Till chivalry arose there was nothing to uphold it; but from that moment, with a champion in the field to lead forth the knowledge that had been imprisoned in the cloister, the influence of religion began to spread and increase. Though worldly men thereunto attached the aggrandizement of their own temporal power, and knaves and villains made it the means of their avarice, or the cloak of their vice, still the influence of the divine truth itself gradually wrought upon the hearts of men, purifying, calming, refining, till the world grew wise enough to separate the perfection of the gospel from the weakness of its teachers, and to reject the errors while they restrained the power of the Roman church.

"In the mean time chivalry stood forth the most glorious institution that man himself ever devised. In its youth and in its simplicity, it appeared grand and beautiful, both from its own intrinsic excellence, and from its contrast with the things around. In its after years it acquired pomp and luxury; and to pomp and luxury naturally succeeded decay and death; but still the legacy that it left behind it to posterity was a treasure of noble feelings and generous principles.

"There cannot be a doubt that chivalry, more than any other institution (except religion) aided to work out the civilization of Europe. It first taught devotion and reverence to those weak, fair beings, who but in their beauty and their gentleness have no defence. It first raised love above the passions of the brute, and by dignifying woman, made woman worthy of love. It gave purity to enthusiasm, crushed barbarous selfishness, taught the heart to expand like a flower to the sunshine, beautified glory with generosity, and smoothed even the rugged brow of war.

"For the mind, as far as knowledge went, chivalry itself did little; but by its influence it did much. For the heart it did everything; and there is scarcely a noble feeling or a bright aspiration that we find among ourselves, or trace in the history of modern Europe, that is not in some degree referrible to that great and noble principle, which has no name but the Spirit of Chivalry."

He briefly sums up the well-known causes which prepared Europe to pour itself upon the holy land.

"Still the persecution of the christians in Palestine, and the murder and pillage of the pilgrims continued; still the indignation of Europe, fed and renewed by repeated tales of cruel barbarity committed in the Holy Land—sufferings of the church—insults to religion—and merciless massacres of countrymen and relations: still, also, the spirit of chivalry was each day spreading further and rising more powerfully, so that all was preparing for some great and general movement. The lightning of the crusade was in the people's hearts, and it wanted but one electric touch to make it flash forth upon the world."

"The number of knights" (at the siege of Nice) "is stated to have reached nearly two hundred thousand, which left a fair proportion of inferior soldiers. Doubtless Soliman thought to meet, in the immense multitude before him, a wild and undisciplined crowd, like that of Peter the hermit; but he soon found bitterly his mistake. The crusaders received him every where with chivalric valor, repulsed him on all points, became in turn the assailants, and the plain around Nice grew one general scene of conflict. The charging of the cavalry, the ringing of the lances, and the swords, upon shields and corselets, the battle-cries of the christians, and the tecbir of the Turks; the shouts, the screams, the groans, rose up, we are told, in a roar horrible to hear.

"At length, finding that the sally he had expected was not made, Soliman retreated to the mountains; but it was only to repeat the attempt the following day. In this, although the besieged now comprehended his intention, and issued forth upon the christians on the one side, while he attacked them on the other, he was not more fortunate than before. He was again repelled with great loss, owning his astonishment at the lion-like courage of the christian leaders, who, with a thousand lances, would often charge and put to flight twenty times the number of Turkish horsemen.

"According to a barbarous custom prevalent at that time, and which even descended to a much later period, the crusaders hewed off the heads of the fallen Moslems, and cast many of them into the city. Others were sent to Constantinople in token of victory; and Alexius, as a sign of gratitude and rejoicing, instantly dispatched large presents to the principal chiefs of the crusade, with great quantities of provisions for the army, which had long been straitened to a fearful degree.

"After the defeat of Soliman, the siege was pressed with renewed vigor; and battering-rams, catapults, and mangonels were plied incessantly against the walls, while moveable towers of wood, called beffroys, filled with armed men, were rolled close to the fortifications, for the purpose of carrying on the fight hand to hand with the enemy, and of endeavoring to effect a lodgment on the battlements.

"In the mean while, the plains around Nice offered a spectacle of the most extraordinary brilliancy. The glittering arms of the knights, their painted shields, and fluttering pennons—the embroidered banners of the barons, their splendid coats-of-arms and magnificent mantles—the gorgeous robes of the Latin priests, who were present in immense numbers, and the animated multitude of bowmen and foot-soldiers, mingled with thousands of that most beautiful of beasts, the horse, all spread out in the unclouded brightness of an Asiatic sky, formed as shining and extraordinary a scene as the eye could look upon.

"Not frightened, however, by the terrific splendor that surrounded them, the Turks continued to defend their battlements with persevering valor. Every attack of the christians was met with dauntless intrepidity, and every labored attempt to sap the wall, or its towers, was frustrated with unwearied assiduity. Those who approached near were either slain by poisoned arrows, or crushed under immense stones; and the moment any one was killed at the foot of the wall, 'it was horrible to see the Turks,' says an eye-witness, 'seize upon the body with iron hooks let down from above, and lifting it up through the air, strip it completely, and then cast it out from the city.' Innumerable artifices were resorted to by the assailants to force their way into the town; and none of the chiefs seem to have been more active and ingenious than the count of Toulouse, who once succeeded in undermining a tower, and casting it to the ground. Before this work was concluded, however, night had fallen over the army, and ere the next morning the laborious activity of the Turks had repaired the damage which their wall had suffered."

We conclude with two extracts: the one describing the crusaders' first sight of Jerusalem, and the other the fanatical massacres which succeeded the taking of that city.

"At the end of three days, the host of the Cross was once more in motion; and passing by Sidon, Acre, Ramula, and Emmaus, approached the city of Jerusalem. At Emmaus, deputies arrived from the christians of Bethlehem, praying for immediate aid against their infidel oppressors. Tancred was in consequence sent forward with a hundred lances; but the tidings of a deputation from Bethlehem spread new and strange sensations through the bosoms of the crusaders. That word Bethlehem, repeated through the camp, called up many ideas connected with that sweet religion, which, however perverted, was still the thrilling faith of every heart around. The thoughts of their proximity to the Savior's birth-place, banished sleep from every eyelid; and before midnight was well past, the whole host was on foot towards Jerusalem. It was a lovely morning, we are told, in the summer time; and after they had wandered on for some time in the darkness, the sun rushed into the sky with the glorious suddenness of eastern dawn, and Jerusalem lay before their eyes.

"The remembrance of all that that mighty city had beheld; the enthusiasm of faith; the memory of dangers, and ills, and fatigues, and privations endured and conquered; the fulfillment of hope; the gratification of long desire; the end of fear and doubt, combined in every bosom to call up the most vivid joy. The name was echoed by a thousand tongues—Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Some shouted to the sky, some knelt and prayed, some wept in silence, and some cast themselves down and kissed the blessed earth. 'All had much ado,' says Fuller, with his emphatic plainness, 'to manage so great a gladness.'

"To rejoicing, at the sight of the holy city, succeeded wrath at seeing it in the hands of the infidels. The army marched forward in haste, drove in some parties of Saracens, who had vauntingly come forth from the gates; and Jerusalem was invested on all sides. Some of the people, indeed, approached barefoot, in deep humiliation, and in remembrance of the sufferings of Him who had purchased salvation to a world by agony and death; but the greater part of the soldiers advanced with purposes of wrath, and took up their various warlike positions round about the town. The attack was begun almost immediately after the first preparations; and Godfrey of Bouillon, Tancred the duke of Normandy, and Robert of Flanders, by a vigorous effort, carried the barbicans, and reached the wall. A portion of this, also, was thrown down with axes and picks; and several knights, mounting by ladders to the top of the battlements, under a hail of arrows and Greek fire, fought for some time hand to hand with the Turks."

"An immense number of Saracens had betaken themselves to the temple of Soliman, as it was called, and there had prepared to defend themselves to the last; but the pursuers were too strong to be resisted, and nearly ten thousand men are said to have fallen in that building. Those even who had climbed to the roof were sought out the next day, and several, to avoid the sword, cast themselves down, and were dashed to pieces.

"Some authors mention a second massacre, and generally exaggerate the butchery that was perpetrated. In regard to this second massacre, there is much historical evidence to show that no such event took place; and I would fain believe that it was not the case. It cannot, however, be denied, that the most humane of the christian leaders in that age were taught to look upon all mercy to the infidels as an injury to religion; and it is beyond doubt, that after the general slaughter committed on the capture of Jerusalem, Godfrey de Bouillon, with the other leaders and soldiers, washed away the marks of gore, cast off their armor, assumed the robe of penitents, and, going to the holy sepulchre, offered up their prayers to the mild teacher of our beautiful religion, convinced that they had accomplished a great and glorious work, and consummated an acceptable sacrifice in the blood of the infidels.

"Such was the doctrine which, in that day, men were taught from their cradles: such the strange interpretation put upon the gospel of peace."

Fragments of Voyages and Travels. By Captain Basil Hall. Three vols. 12mo. Edinburgh. 1831.

English travellers in America form a class of authors perfectly distinct from every other set of literati. Although they are, by no means, always destitute either of good feeling or clear intellect, the manner in which their knowledge of this country is generally collected, and the mistakes, inconsistencies, and examples of glaring ignorance which, arranged in elegant periods and printed on the finest paper, swell out their octavos, have naturally produced singular misconceptions respecting our character, in Great Britain, and a strong prejudice against their tribe in this country. What an egregious vanity is betrayed by Captain Hall, in supposing himself competent, from a mere running glance at our institutions, either to comprehend their nature, or to judge of their effects, and yet observe with what an air of sober conviction he will contradict the testimony of a nation; believe that, with a single effort of mind he can embrace the whole field of our political and domestic economy, and the heterogeneous materials which constitute our population. Instead of dwelling for years among us, and carefully studying all the time our traits of character, both individual and national, before deciding upon a subject so vast and complicated, and upon experiments which only centuries can properly test, such an one will arrive in a packet, put up at the city-hotel, spend a few days in New-York, take a trip to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Boston; sip water at the Springs, snatch a glance at Niagara, lounge in the lobby of the theatres, dine with a few of the "principal inhabitants!" and lo! an octavo, political, commercial, and agricultural, describing manners, customs, and institutions, with witty disquisitions upon Americanisms, and sketches of national character, at which your honest Londoner, who neither knows nor cares whether New-York is in North or South America, on the Atlantic or the Pacific—and who would believe Sir Oracle, should he declare that the president wears a blanket and feather, and tattoos his skin—will slap his ample knee, and shake his replenished sides with laughter, and then suffer his recollections of our country to fade away dimly among confused accounts of Siberia, or of the Pacific islands, where the savages have two mouths; or Patagonia, where every man is a monster and a cannibal, from ten to fifteen feet high.

We give below a sketch of Basil Hall, from the last number of the London Quarterly Review, though it considerably softens down the prominent features in the royal captain and prolific writer's character, it proves that even his own countrymen are aware of his especial faculty of appreciating his own merits.

"That he has a keen, quick eye, voracious curiosity, restless activity, a gay temperament, and an upright, virtuous mind—no man who has perused his previous lucubrations can doubt. That he is apt to see one side of a thing so vividly as to forget that there is another side at all—that his complete satisfaction with himself, and every thing about him, though unaccompanied with the slightest shade of cynicism, is too prominent not to move, now and then, a passing smile; and that his sincerity cannot always excuse his dogmatism, are facts which his warmest admirers seem to admit. That he tells a story with clearness and energy, describes manners and scenery with very considerable skill and effect, seizes the strong points of a moral or political question, in general, with ready shrewdness, and delivers his opinions on all subjects fairly and frankly; writes in a manly, unaffected style, rough but racy; and makes us feel throughout that we are in the hands of a practical man, clever, humorous, kind-hearted, who has read much, seen more, studied and enjoyed life in a hundred spheres and shapes, a staunch and ardent lover of his country, and in all respects a gentleman—are statements to which, we presume, the captain's bitterest political opponent would hardly refuse his imprimatur."

Notwithstanding the captain's abominable book about the Americans, or, in his phraseology, "the people of the United States," we must confess he is a writer of much smoothness and pleasantness; and, when his overweening self-complacency and rank prejudices are out of the way, we are borne along through his pages with very little effort or reluctance on our part. In justice to one who has been sadly scolded in this country, and to show that we bear no malice, we solicit our readers to peruse the following sketch, from the volume, the name of which stands at the head of this article, and if they do not relax the formidable frown which brings the "angry spot" on every American's brow at the mention of the author's name, they must attach more importance than we to his crude and illiberal opinions of us as a nation.

"On Sunday the captain always dines with the officers in the ward-room; and although 'shore-going people' sometimes take upon themselves to quiz these periodical, and heaven knows! often formal, dinner parties, there can be no doubt that they do contribute, and that in a most essential degree, to the maintenance of strict discipline on board ship. Indeed, I believe it is now generally admitted, that it would be next to impossible to preserve good order in a man of war, for any length of time, without this weekly ceremonial, coupled, of course, with that of the officers' dining, in turn, with their captain. I can compare the harsh and grating state of affairs on board ship, when, unhappily, there exists bad blood between the captain and officers, to nothing so well as to an engine, amongst the machinery of which a handful of gravel has been cast. But it may be asked, how can the simple operation of dining together once or twice a week stave off so great an evil?

"Suppose, in the first place, that the captain comes upon deck just before noon, and, on seeing something wrong—the main-yard not braced up enough, the lee foretop-gallant sheet not home, or the jib not quite hoisted up; and suppose that, as these are points upon which, whether whimsically or not, he is very particular, he expresses himself to the officer in terms rather too strong for the occasion. Without reflecting upon the injustice he is guilty of, the captain may, perhaps, in this way be punishing a zealous and hard-working man, for a mere trifle, almost as severely as if he had been found sleeping on his watch.

"The officer, who can say nothing, bows and submits. In a few minutes the sun comes to the meridian, and it is made twelve o'clock. The boatswain pipes to dinner, the deck is relieved, and the lieutenant of the forenoon watch goes down below, in a high state of irritation with his captain, at what he conceives the undue severity of the reprimand. The first thing he does, on entering the ward-room, is to fling his hat the whole length of the apartment; so that, unless it be adroitly caught by the marine officer, who is generally playing the flute on the lockers abaft, it would stand a chance of going out of the stern-windows. The soldier, of course, thus called upon to look up, stops in the middle of the second bar of 'God save the king,' or 'Robin Adair,' at which he has been hammering, in company with the master of the band, for the last three months, and says, 'Holla! man—what's the matter?' 'Matter!' cries the other. 'I'll be shot if it is not enough to make a man run stark staring mad!' 'What is the matter, I ask you?' begs the marine, preparing to recommence the eternal tune. 'Why, there have I been working and slaving and wearing my life and soul out all the forenoon, to please that ill-tempered, snappish, ill-to-please, knob of a skipper of ours; and what do I get? Why, he takes a mighty good care to shut his eyes to all the good a fellow does, but catches hold eagerly enough of the smallest omission in his thousand-and-one whims (none of which are of any consequence!) in order to indulge himself in one of his reprimands. It's quite clear,' adds the officer, warmed by this explosion of his own passion, 'that the captain has a spite at me, and is determined to drive me out of the ship, to make way for some follower of his own.' 'Stuff and nonsense!' exclaims the peace-making man of war; 'the captain is the best friend you have.' 'Friend!' roars the other, 'I tell you what—' But just at this moment the captain's steward enters the ward-room, and going up to the enraged officer of the forenoon watch, says mechanically to him—'The captain's compliments, sir, and will be glad of your company to dinner.' To which the officer replies, quite as mechanically—'My compliments, and I'll wait on him.' But as soon as the door is shut, he turns again to the marine, and says—'I'm deucedly sorry, now, that I did not refuse.' 'Are you?' says the soldier, relapsing into his loyal tune again. By and by, however, comes two o'clock; the ward-room dinner is placed on the table; the drum beats the 'Roast beef'; the officer of the forenoon watch is sent for, as usual, to relieve his messmate on deck; and, in due course, after strutting and fretting his hour upon the stage in 'full togs,' nursing his anger, in order to let the captain see that he is hurt, he is told that dinner is ready in the cabin. In he marches, accordingly, and there takes his appointed seat, as doggedly as if he were nailed to the chair. The pea-soup is discussed in pretty solemn silence; but while the remove is under adjustment, the captain says to his offended officer, 'Come, Mr. Haultight, shall you and I have a glass of wine? What shall it be?' By these few magical words, and in this single glass of sherry, is forgotten, for ever and ever, all the previous irritation. It is not by the words, so much as by the tone and manner of saying them, that the captain makes the officer feel how anxious he is to have the good understanding restored, or that he regrets what has passed. Of course, if the officer be not one of those pig-headed and inflexible fellows, upon whom all sense of kindness is wasted, he seizes the bottle, and filling his glass, replies, 'With all my heart, sir.' And there, in all probability, is an end of the matter.

"The above example is one in which the superior is supposed to have been in the wrong; but, as may be imagined, the opposite case will often happen likewise. I have seen an officer go on, for several days together, purposely teasing his captain, but all the time taking the greatest possible care to keep within the law. Who, I may ask, that has had to do with command of any kind, whether afloat or on shore, in the navy or in the nursery, has not felt the provocation of this petty hostility? For my part, I can compare it to nothing but the stinging of a musketoe, which you spend half the night in trying to catch, losing your rest and your temper to no purpose, owing to the dexterity of your antagonist, who thus shows that, though he be small, he is far from insignificant. But if, while this sort of snapping and snarling is going on, Sunday comes about, all is settled. On this day the captain invariably dines in the ward-room; and when once there, he is received, as a matter of course, with attention by all—Mr. Musketoe inclusive. It is the general custom, on these occasions, to unbend a little of the straight-lacedness of our discipline, so that a kind of regulated, starched familiarity is permitted to appear above the surface. This the captain rather encourages, though, of course, in a cautious way, but more than he ever permits himself to allow at his own table. During dinner all the officers drink wine with their guest; and when this office of hospitality is performed by the tormenting officer, above alluded to, the captain, if he be a man of sense, will not fail to play off a little of his agreeableness upon the person who has been buzzing round him during the preceding week. By this means, or some one of the numberless little devices which people who are met together professedly to be social, always know how to hit upon, all such sores as this, and many others, may be wiped off. Without some safety-valve of this kind to the high pressure of naval discipline, I really do not know how so enormous and complicated a contrivance could go on at all."

Private Memoirs of Napoleon Bonaparte, during the periods of the Directory, the Consulate, and the Empire. By M. De Bourrienne, Private Secretary to the Emperor. 2 vols. 8vo. Philadelphia. Carey and Lea. 1831.

Napoleon has supplied the world with themes of reflection which are yet far from being exhausted. There is about his history, even in its most unimportant and trifling details, a romantic, we may add a thrilling interest and curiosity, which seem to have been rendered only more restless and intense by the attempts that have been made to gratify them. As he was no ordinary character, he cannot be compared with common men, or estimated by common rule. Even the standards of moral right are relative, and sometimes arbitrary. What would be atrocious in a private individual, cannot be so considered in the emperor of France, or at least must be regarded from a different point of view, and with different principles. It is this peculiar situation which Napoleon holds relative to his fellow-men, that renders an impartial biography of him difficult, almost impossible. An enemy can, by the simplest sophistry, and without violating truth, draw a picture of him from which the soul must recoil in horror, while a friend, with equal justice, finds in almost every thought and action, the materials of greatness and virtue almost too vast to be reconciled with the character of a mortal. It is quite fashionable for the critics of the present day to assert that only "posterity can furnish for him a dispassionate historian." We deem this little better than a plausible error. A biography, accurate in every respect will probably never appear; and it is equally apparent to us that there will never be produced, as a whole, one better than that from the pen of Scott. True, the novelist and poet has occasionally darkened his pages with a spirit rather too purely national. He often looks through the medium of English feeling, and strains after impartiality with an effort which evidently proves him partial. Yet we have no idea that he has wilfully mis-stated any facts—nor betrayed any bias against him as strong as would have been the enthusiasm of a Frenchman in his favor—or as subversive of truth as would have been the want of talent in almost any other writer. Neither is it probable that time will eradicate party feeling respecting Napoleon, any more than it will wear away his name from the tablet of history. Future biographers will set out, also, influenced by a desire to draw him either good or bad, with fewer sources of information, and fewer witnesses competent to rectify their mistakes, and dependent for their knowledge upon the very works now condemned for the zeal of friendship, or the malevolence of enmity. If it were possible to complete a history of the subject of these memoirs, copied exactly by truth herself from reality, there would be the same conflict of opinions—the same outcry by persons whose prejudices and ignorance totally incapacitate them for criticising the descriptions of others.

Another charge against Bourrienne is of an equally flimsy texture. He is censured, not for false assertions—for the accuracy of his statements, except upon several points of minor consideration, is, we believe, generally conceded—but for having availed himself of his intimacy with Napoleon to observe him narrowly, and for having given the results of his observations to the world. We have now before us a communication from an esteemed correspondent, declaring, in no very particular terms, his disapprobation of the secretary who, he says "was bound to Napoleon by the strongest ties; he was the play-fellow of his youth, his companion and confidant when general, consul, and emperor. By his friend's exertions he was recalled from exile, and by his master's interest, fortune's rugged path was smoothed before him." It is to such persons that we are to look for accounts of Napoleon's private character; and, in giving to the world and to posterity their opinions of a man who will never be forgotten, the responsibility of their task is great, and should raise them above the weakness of either gratitude or of malice. To draw a veil over the faults of a friend in the conversations of social life, is a duty as graceful and noble as it is necessary; but with these considerations the author of memoirs has nothing to do. He is then elevated to the station of a judge, where it would be criminal to let his feelings counteract the truth. The details are written in an able manner—abundant in the most interesting anecdotes and descriptions, and will be perused with general avidity. The frequent sketches of men well known to fame, will, by themselves, amply compensate the reader, and the neat and elegant style in which the work is printed, detracts in nothing from the reputation of the publishers. We should have given it a more circumstantial notice, but it has been long before the British public, and many extracts have found their way across the water. Of the counter-statements which have appeared, contradicting several of the details, we know nothing, and shall not therefore speak, although, perhaps, that is an insufficient apology for remaining silent, at a time when opinions are laid down by every body upon every thing, and whole volumes are reviewed without a reading.

Directions for Invigorating and Prolonging Life: or, the Invalid's Oracle. By William Kitchiner, M. D. author of the "Cook's Oracle and Housekeeper's Manual," &c. &c. From the sixth London edition; revised and corrected. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

The art of prolonging life is simple and easy, and is embraced in a few rules. Moderation in all things, total abstinence from injurious stimuli, uniform exercise, and a clear conscience, which latter article "doth invalids make," as well as "cowards," of the good people, our fellow-creatures. Dr. Kitchiner, however, deems that the complicated customs and multiplied temptations of our happy state of civilization, require certain detailed directions, and accordingly here they are, in a neat octodecimo volume of two hundred and fifty-two pages, from the press of the Brothers Harper.

The Last Night of Pompeii, a Poem; Portrait of Passion; and Lays and Legends, in prose and poetry. By Sumner L. Fairfield. New-York.

Mr. Fairfield, with whose writings the public are well acquainted, has issued proposals for publishing, by subscription, a volume under the foregoing title. The following are the plan and object of the work:

"The disastrous theme of the first and most extended poem of the proposed collection cannot be unknown; and all will perceive that the incidents of the destruction, sudden and imminent as they were, unfold to the imagination a wide field of description. The splendor of the Roman empire, and the exalted and beneficent character of its reigning monarch; the purity of life, the dangers, the majesty, and humility of the perilled disciples of the cross; the opulence and pride of the pretors; the unretiring profligacy and debased licentiousness of the people, afford ample space for enlarged portraiture, moral delineation, and intellectual power.

"It is intended in the 'Portraits of Passion' to exhibit the evil consequences of devotion to those dreadful influences which desolate society and demoralize the heart. 'The Lays and Legends' will illustrate the romance of history and tradition—the events that float around the confines of record, and the less public occurrences which characterized the early settlement of our land.

"The volume will embrace three hundred octavo pages, be handsomely printed on fine paper, with new type, and delivered to subscribers at two dollars."

In addition to the foregoing, we copy a few lines from the manuscript, which will speak for themselves:

From the last Night of Pompeii.

Fame! 'tis the dew hour's solitary dream,
The sigh of the lone midnight, uttered forth
By the wing'd phantoms of the air, and heard
Alone by seraphs on the hills of heaven.
'Tis the low trembling strain of burning thought,
That steals, in love's delirium, on the soul,
Startling its dreamy agonies to life.
'Tis the sad voice of sepulchres, on earth
Uttering the glory of the gone—the hymn
Of the dust-shrouded—gushings of the heart
Upon the Lara of a hopeless doom
Darkened in youth; 'tis the gleam of heaven,
(The rapture boon to die in agony.)
On darkness and despair and lonely death!
The algerine spirit, the hyena heart,
That rots in atrocities of guilt.
The serpent-savage of hate, the silent snarl
Of vengeance, and pale envy's wrathful mock
Attend, like glutton vipers, on thy path,
And feast their passion on their shuddering prey.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 112.

"It sometimes happens," said the Genius, "that they who preach the purest doctrines to others, practise the most evil deeds themselves. You may scarcely estimate the wickedness done in the world by men who call themselves good; destitute of any standard of nobleness, generosity, and real virtue in their own bosoms, they ascertain precisely how far they can avail themselves of the misfortunes of others for their own profit, take advantage of their ignorance, or practise upon them actual fraud, without being exposed to the power of the law. They are honest only when they cannot be otherwise without danger."

"It is strange that this can be," said I, "in a society like ours. For, even when the vengeance of the law sleeps, public opinion is awake, and sets a mark upon the malefactor more disgraceful than the brand which it was once the custom to inflict upon the forehead."

"Tush, Master Student," cried the Genius, "thou little knowest the ways of the world. The insignificant wretch who, ensnared through ignorance, and driven on by desperation, violates the written statute to procure him a loaf of bread, is dragged by rough hands to the bar of his country, tried and condemned with the pomp and ceremony of justice, immured in a dungeon, or forced to labor like a beast beneath the rod of a master. Even should he escape, through mercy or accident, or after the law has exhausted its energies upon its miserable, defenceless, and degraded victim, public opinion pursues him with an ever-watchful and unrelenting hate. No matter by what awful train of horrors, or by what irresistible strength of temptation, he may have been plunged into momentary guilt, his friends and happy fellow-creatures shrink from him as from contamination. It is before such that the law, too often favoring crimes of great magnitude, parades its majesty, wisdom, and power; and upon whom public opinion stamps a stain as indelible as that fixed on the brow of the first murderer by his offended Creator. So the hypocritical monk thunders the anathemas of the church against some ignorant and trembling wretch, who confesses that he has indulged the trivial pleasures, or dismisses him with pious counsels and haughty threats, and then hastens to the voluptuous joys of his secluded banquet, to riot in the forbidden luxuries of wealth. Public opinion, like the law, frequently overlooks the most powerful villains. The artful swindler, who has kept clear of the statutes, who has amassed wealth and displays splendor, however he may be regarded with silent disapprobation by the really virtuous, who understand his character, may always gather about him a circle of obsequious sycophants, eager to soften his baseness into prudence, and exaggerate his servility into benevolence and virtue. By these means, instead of himself fearing either law or public opinion, he too often becomes the maker or expounder of the one, or the controller of the other."

"And yet," said I, "these hypocrites must be rare, for I have never met them."

"It is even because of their hypocrisy that, when you meet them, you know them not, and therefore are they more detestable than the open criminal. The latter stands before the world in naked depravity. The other comes disguised in the form to which, of all others, the youthful and the good yield implicit confidence and admiration—even that of religion and virtue. In these unsettled times, when the precepts which, in their purity, support and cheer all classes, have been rudely attacked by the aid of learning and talent, it becomes necessary to separate the false from the true disciples, to expose the Judas who would kiss only to betray his master. That they who regard the letter, but despise the spirit of the commandment, may lose at least the influence of their example. But see, the mirror has spread itself out before us, and the shadows are clearing rapidly away."

"Even thus," said I, "have I beheld the masses of rolling clouds melt from the azure face of heaven; and now its lucid surface is clear, and within I behold the likeness of one of the best of men."

"And on what grounds dost thou award to him that envious superiority?"

"The best of all grounds," answered I; "his actions. Even now he is engaged in the most sacred duties which can employ the talents of a good man."

The worthy individual justified my encomiums by his marked perseverance in the cause of humanity. He labored day and night with his tongue and his pen to promote temperance, knowledge, and morality. He went forth with an untiring zeal, and preached the purest counsels to all classes of society, without any discrimination of character, education or talents. At one time he might be observed stealing into the obscure and gloomy dungeon of the convict condemned to death, and pouring balm into his bruised and aching spirit; at another he penetrated into the dwellings of the great, instructed them in virtue, and kindly assisted the mother in the education of her children, and the management of her servants; and if the numerous societies to which he belonged were poor, and weary with labor, he animated their minds with essays and discourses, and went abroad himself to seek donations from the rich, and even the smallest mite—or, as he termed it, the "widow's mite"—from the needy.

"Surely," said I, "this is a good man."

"Observe in silence," said the Genius. "The world is full of deception. The longer you live in it the more you will distrust it."

There was a change in the glass. I beheld a street crowded with low, narrow, dilapidated wooden buildings. Families were huddled together—the pure and the impure—the gentle and the rude—necessity cannot choose her companions. Among them, by the aid of the Little Genius, I could detect a hundred poor honest women, struggling night and day to obtain a wretched living. They were employed in a large factory, where, from sunrise to sunset, without recreation, without exercise, without hope, they toiled. Some had aged parents, others children dependent upon their exertions for a livelihood; yet the reward of their weary and sickening labor was scarcely sufficient to supply a single person with food alone.

"You are aware," said my companion, "that in your happy country the most miserable class is composed of females. The friendless, dependent, and virtuous women who throng to your cities in search of occupation, are forced into the most incessant work, with the least compensation. Even these poverty-stricken children of sorrow are comparatively lucky in having obtained their ill-paid employment. Should they dare to abandon it, they perhaps might be unable to procure any other. They are, therefore, in all but the name, the absolute slaves of him—the honest, industrious, and eloquent individual, whose loud and active support of the principles of virtue you have so freely admired and praised. He himself has accumulated vast and annually increasing riches. Even out of the toil of these women he has accumulated it. The slightest touch of real charity—the remotest approach to a conception of true religion, would induce him to employ them on such terms as, without any sensible diminution of his own overflowing coffers, would give them peace and happiness."

"And he will not, certainly, refuse so easy and delightful a duty," said I.

"Look again," said the Genius.

There had been a slight change in his business, by which his next year's income was to be several hundred dollars less than he expected. He was sitting in a comfortable apartment, with trouble in his countenance. He arose, ever and anon, and walked hastily to and fro, absorbed in deep reflection. The wealthiest men sometimes suffer a trifling pecuniary loss to ruffle their temper, and even to affect their peace of mind. At length his face lighted up with an expression of pleasure, as if he had suddenly conceived an idea which was to extricate him from his dilemma; he partook of the wine which stood on his massive and carved table, and then wrote directions to his agent to cut down the salaries of his working women, that the deficiency in his profits might be thus supplied.

I was about to exclaim at his cruel avarice and selfishness when I was interrupted by another change in the mirror, which discovered the hard and tyrannical master, with a paper in his hand, and words of meekness and benevolence on his lips, going around among his fellow-citizens, seeking donations for a charitable society, and distributing works upon virtue.

OLYMPIAS.

There is a fine piece of irony preserved in Aulus Gellius. When Alexander gave himself out to be the son of Jupiter, Olympias, his mother, wrote to him as follows:—"My dear son, I must entreat your silence; do not render me inimical in the eyes of Juno by your insinuations. You may bring on my head the greatest possible calamity, by declaring that you look upon me as the rival of that goddess."

CONVENTS.

Fuller in his "Holy War" says, "that convents and other hives for drones, were said to have got their best living by the dying."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—May I request you will add the subjoined and recently written biography of the greatest violinist in the world to that of Mozart, published in a late number of your paper? The musical works of gifted composers are now coming into the notice of large classes of society in America who, a few years ago, scarcely dreamed of their existence; and the curiosity of many persons is, consequently, awakened respecting the circumstances of their lives and characters. The difficulty of obtaining in this country original and authentic lives of those distinguished authors who have dazzled the lovers of the art in Europe, form my apology for compiling, instead of attempting any sketch of my own, which would only be new as it wandered from the facts here laid down. The sketch, however, which I send you, I believe does not contain the fact, that when the subject of the memoir became acquainted with Rossini, the latter was so captivated with his talent, that for six months he devoted himself exclusively to the study of the violin; and Myerbeer, the celebrated composer, was equally fascinated in the same manner. The compositions of this extraordinary man are described as abounding in charming melodies; and presenting striking combinations of profound skill and bold originality. PORTIA.

SKETCH OF NICHOLAS PAGANINI.

Compiled for the Mirror.

NICHOLAS PAGANINI was born at Genoa on the eighteenth of February, 1784. His father, who followed the occupation of a commercial traveller, was passionately fond of music, and could himself perform on the mandolin with sufficient skill to initiate his son into the rudiments of the art. Scarcely had he attained his eighth year, when his progress appeared almost miraculous. At this period he already performed three times each week in the choir of the church, and occasionally at private concerts. He also paid frequent visits to his countryman, Francesco Ginecco, a musical composer, whose operas had been successfully received at many of the theatres of Italy, and whose influence over the youthful artist had doubtless some share in the development of his early talent. Soon afterwards Paganini essayed his powers of composition. Even before this period, under the direction of his father, he had already written a sonata, which, however, was lost amongst other compositions of his childhood. At the age of nine years, he for the first time performed in public at the grand theatre of his native city, in which Marchesi, the greatest singer of his day, had recently arrived with the celebrated Madame Albertinotti. The former requested Paganini's father to allow the child to perform at a representation for his benefit, and, in return, promised the addition of his talents to the attraction of the first concert to be given by the young violinist. On both these occasions Paganini played his variations of the republican air, La Carmagnola, and was rewarded with the enthusiastic plaudits of Marchesi and the audience, who in the infant candidate for their favor had judgment enough to discern one of the future glories of Italy, that land of poetry, of music, and of song.

Incapable of longer guiding with advantage the studies of young Paganini, his father placed him under the direction of Costa, the first violinist of Genoa, who in the space of six months gave his pupil about thirty lessons. The latter, however, was unable to form himself to the method of his new master, for whose attention he felt grateful, but from whose genius his own was essentially different. Accordingly, the father determined to confide his son to the care of the celebrated composer Rolla, then living at Parma. At the moment of their arrival, Rolla being confined to his bed by severe indisposition, the visitors were ushered into an adjoining apartment. Near a violin, placed on the table, lay the composer's latest musical work. At a look from his father, Paganini seized the instrument, and à vista executed with the utmost precision a new concerto of Rolla; who, in the excess of his amazement, forgetting his illness, raised himself upright in his bed, and eagerly demanded to be made acquainted with the skilful professor to whom he was indebted for so agreeable a surprise. "'Tis a child," was the reply. To convince himself of the truth of the assertion, the maestro, regardless of the consequences, rushed from the apartment, and, unable to doubt the testimony of his own eyes and ears—"I can teach you nothing," said he, when he had heard the request of Paganini's father, "you must address yourself to Paër, for with me you would but lose your time."

Paër, who was at that time director of the controversy at Parma, received the new comers with the utmost courtesy,

The most tempting engagements were offered to different cities of Italy, but were invariably declined by the independent artist; who expressed his desire of travelling through Europe, unfettered by any restraint upon his person. As a proof, however, that the execution of our resolves depends but little on ourselves, it may be here stated, that, in spite of his roving propensities, a period of twenty years intervened between Paganini's determination to leave his native land and his actual departure. His grand tour, if we may so term it, commenced in 1828; but till that period, whether by the effect of accident or caprice, his travels had never extended beyond the Italian frontier.

At a moment of youthful impetuosity, Paganini had vowed never to sacrifice his independence by accepting any engagement. At a subsequent period, however, he seemed to have been influenced by the inhabitants of the singular country, and to have been well-known by his skill, Paganini had the advantage of deciding the merits of Kreutzer's concerto at Paris. Lafont's variations were responded by a ready notice. He received with a truly appointing rendering full Paganini had The ten years and burst into tears. "Ah!" exclaimed he, "I have again found my public of Vienna!"

This extraordinary artist's progress through Germany may be said to have resembled a triumphal march. On more than one occasion, formal deputations were despatched from various towns for the purpose of imploring him to allow the inhabitants an opportunity of publicly evincing their admiration of his talents. At Frankfort, where he passed nearly twelve months, he maintained his prodigious reputation undiminished—to increase it were impossible. At length the intelligence of his arrival at Strasburg excited amongst the French public a sensation, in comparison with which even the fever of political effervescence was absolute calmness. A nervous attack, with spasms, which occasioned a momentary interruption to his first concert in that city, served but to enhance the interest irresistibly awakened by his incomparable execution, and by the expression of inspiration, which during his performance irradiated his sallow features. From Strasburg he proceeded to Colmar, and thence to Paris, where his first public concert took place on the ninth of March, at the Académie Royale de Musique. The unanimous and tumultuous plaudits of the Parisians have ratified, though they could not add to his fame. His triumph in the capital of the grande nation has not been inferior to that which stamped his reputation at Vienna.

From M. Schottky's work we extract a passage, well calculated to pique the curiosity of the dilettanti; it relates to a child, named Camillo Sivori, the son of a Genoese merchant: "The youth (it is Paganini himself who speaks) had barely attained his seventh year when I instructed him in the elements of music. At the expiration of three days he played several pieces with such facility that everybody exclaimed, Paganini has wrought a miracle! After the lapse of fifteen days, he performed at a public concert. It is but justice to add, that his progress was greatly facilitated by the perfect accuracy of his ear. My secret once known, artists will devote more serious attention to the study of the violin—an instrument which affords far greater resources than they are apt to imagine. My system will one day be adopted. The method at present followed, and which rather embarrasses than assists the learner, will be abandoned for mine, which requires nothing more than the regular practice of five or six hours each day. It is, however, a gross mistake to imagine that my secret may be discovered by my mode of tuning a violin, or by my style of performance. He that would reap the benefit of my secret must be possessed of intellect."

With a brief description of Paganini's personal appearance we shall now conclude our task. At first sight the spectator is struck with his emaciated form—with the timid, yet penetrating expression of his countenance—with the sallowness of his features, in strange relief with the jet black hair that falls in disorder on his forehead. His dark and hollow eye, lighted up but by rare and momentary flashes of enthusiasm—his care-worn visage, and the apparently enfeebled state of his health, exhibit evident indications of that desolating sorrow which results not so much from the experience of positive evil, as from a weariness of life, and the loss of all its illusions. His lips, around which occasionally plays a smile of bitter irony—his lofty forehead—his broad profile—all bear the impress of that talent which, when he touches his favorite instrument, reveals itself to his audience with a degree of intensity scarcely conceivable but to those who have seen and heard this musical phenomenon.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

Translated from the French, for the New-York Mirror.

THE MARRIAGE LOTTERY.

At a period when the passion for play has become so general, that both great and small indulge themselves continually with games of chance, and hazard in lotteries, not only money but property of every description, it may perhaps be worth while to give an account of a very peculiar lottery which was drawn a few years ago.

A young lady announced in the papers that she had formed the resolution to dispose of herself in a lottery. She stated that she was thirty-two years of age, of a good education, agreeable manners, and with a fortune of sixty-five thousand francs. An engraving annexed to the advertisement exhibited a female of a very pretty figure, and arch countenance. "For a number of years," said Mademoiselle Fortuna, the name which our unknown personage had assumed, "many suitors have presented themselves before me, but my father has found objections to all and each of them. All appearing to seek my dowry rather than my affections, I did not much regret their loss. One of them really interested me, but my father dismissed him with the rest. In my sorrow, I determined to receive no more addresses, and to wait till I should be mistress of my own hand. In the interval, my lover married without consulting me. Suitors now present themselves in greater numbers than ever, and the only difficulty is to make a selection. How shall I distinguish him who is moved only by disinterested affection? Despairing to make the selection myself, I have determined to put it to a hazard which I dare hope will be providentially directed. Consequently I here declare that the man who shall gain the highest lot at the approaching drawing of the lottery of Brunswick, shall be regarded by me as a spouse appointed by heaven. My care and tenderness shall prove to him that he has also gained the highest lot of conjugal felicity. I cannot believe myself running a greater hazard than the crowds of young ladies whose fathers daily dispose of them in what are called marriages of convenience. I am entirely resigned to my fate."

The price of a ticket was three francs. The originality of the proposition, the whimsicality of the lady, and the reasonableness of the price, all combined to attract a large number of purchasers. Many a young man took twenty tickets; many married men also took them, without reflecting upon the embarrassment it would occasion, if the fair one should by chance fall to them. Profound lawyers, in more than one circle where the subject was discussed, decided that the lady would have a right to insist upon a due celebration of the marriage, whatever was the nature of previous engagements. Mademoiselle Fortuna became the subject of every conversation. Many of those news-tellers to whom there is no mystery, gave out that they knew the young lady, and but for their usual discretion, would mention her name confidentially to their friends. The ladies remarked with unusual severity upon the impropriety of her conduct; young people could not mention her without blushing; and more than one of the elderly maidens, after having declared such a proceeding a scandal to the sex, determined to offer themselves in a lottery as speedily as possible. During these debates the tickets were rapidly taken up, and soon entirely exhausted.

At length the grand day of the drawing arrived. A physician in a little city of Saxony was the happy mortal to whom blind chance had assigned the beautiful unknown. The poor fellow had meddled in the lottery without knowing what he was about. The death of his father had made it his duty to put himself at the head of an apothecary's shop, which had been handed down with honor in his family for seven generations. He had already destined his counter for a young girl who had been educated like himself in the profession of pharmacy; and they had been solemnly betrothed. Nevertheless, the sixty-five thousand francs of Mademoiselle Fortuna formed a considerable counterpoise to the sentiments and projects of the tender, but prudent apothecary. In his perplexity, he consulted with several of his friends, and their advice only tended to make him still more perplexed than ever. While in this state, one day holding the ticket of his destiny in his hand, his eyes fixed upon the fortunate number, he received the following letter:

"I learn, sir, that fortune has designed you for the companion of my life. Under this title I owe you the most unlimited confidence, of which I am about to give you a striking proof. Since the day that I put my person and my fortune in the lottery, an event has occurred of the highest importance. The man to whom I was long since ready to give my hand, has recovered his liberty by the death of his wife, and has plainly signified that, in spite of appearances, his sentiments in respect to me have never varied. My heart (who can control the heart?) has never ceased to be his. It is only with him and by him that any happiness is in store for me upon the earth. He asks no dowry—he will not accept a ducat—he wishes only for myself. But as my conscience forbids that I should wrong the posterity with which I may be blessed, I belong, with all my fortune, to the beloved of my heart."

"This, sir, you will acknowledge to be a frank avowal. If you are determined, however, to hold me to the agreement which I have solemnly published in sixty thousand advertisements of my lottery, I am resigned, and entirely at your service; but I do not promise that our union shall not be an anticipation of what it would not be polite to mention. I will never love you, but always consider you as the destroyer of my happiness. In short, I am resolved not to grant to a maker of pills what I have refused to the only amiable and worthy man who has ever made an impression upon my heart."

"Let us come to the point, which in your eyes must be most essential. Lawyers of great learning inform me that by remitting the price of your ticket I should be entirely discharged from you; but heaven forbid that I should give you so good an opinion of my delicacy. I offer you twenty thousand francs in specie. This sum will serve to increase the number of your phials, and will render you very interesting in the opinion of any belle of your town. No one will rejoice more in the success of your business and the happiness of your marriage, than your humble servant, FORTUNA."

The wise apothecary wasted no time in reflection; he immediately inserted in all the journals from one end of the country to the other, that he accepted the twenty thousand francs. In a few days the sum was remitted to him through an unknown hand.

Should you like to know the origin of this singular lottery and of this lady Fortuna? Three young men, with more wit than money, and less honesty than either, imagined that by an advertisement of this odd character, they could not fail to obtain a prompt sale for about sixty thousand tickets at so moderate a price, and that there were a thousand methods of eluding the proposed marriage. The event proved that they had calculated shrewdly. They received one hundred and forty-four thousand francs, and obtained a peaceable possession by the sacrifice of twenty thousand.

H.

THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

THE extreme heat of the weather, and also many pressing avocations, must be our apology for a slender knowledge of the theatrical matters of the past week. The three houses, however, like so many right good racers, are stretching all sinews to reach the goal of public favor. The beautiful Cinderella gleamed upon the world on Tuesday for the fortieth and last time this season, and Burke has been reflecting in his little person all the mighty and opposite passions of human nature, as the external world is imaged in miniature in a convex mirror.

The Bowery is also beginning to exert a powerful attraction. The new drama of Cagliostro, (pronounced without the g) is imposing and splendid. Simultaneous bursts of applause repeatedly testified the surprise and approbation of the audience at the novelty and gorgeousness of the scenery. The spells of the hero, beneath the castle, conjure up volumes of vapor, which, at first, floating dimly in the air, thicken into a fume, and then a mist, till the dark masses of clouds roll over and melt into each other, and the stage is entirely enveloped, like the summit of some sky-cleaving mountain. The last scene is, however, by far the most successful. Its magnificence is enhanced by the uncommon depth and height of the stage, flung open to its utmost extent. The shadowy forms of war and ruin, seen confusedly through the gleam of the fight on the distant battlements—the bodies of the soldiers, hurled from the lofty turrets—the fine masses of dim and gigantic buildings, and the idea of distance and vastness which the painter has happily produced, afford a very vivid realization of the most intensely interesting descriptions of Ivanhoe, and certain portions of history, the bodily exhibition of which few will have an opportunity of beholding with more striking effect. Mr. Scott enacted Cagliostro in his best manner. Mr. G. Jones is a spirited performer, and Mrs. Stone and Miss Felby both much above mediocrity. As a spectacle, Cagliostro is too brilliantly beautiful not to prove attractive, while as an acting piece it contains many good points. We understand the manager has engaged Mr. Cooper and Mr. Booth for the purpose of bringing forth the legitimate drama in a superior style. These gentlemen, with the addition of Mr. Hamblin himself, will form a combination of talent which has never hitherto been marshaled within this theatre.

At the Chatham, Mr. Archer has appeared several times. Mr. C. Thorne is also sustaining the first parts. On Monday evening they undertook Rolla and Pizarro; Elvira, Mrs. Hughes. Archer, as the Feruvian hero, though gifted with a prepossessing person and rich voice, was deficient in polish and tenderness, but in other respects merited praise. Mr. Thorne discovered a true conception of Pizarro, and, in points, was excellent. He wants study, practice, and observation. There is an occasional slight inaccuracy in his enunciation, in the more violent passages, which betrays inexperience. But, however his delineation may require to be retouched in its shadowing, the outline was quite as good as, if not better than our general run of Pizarro's, Barry excepted. He displayed force and expression, which are much in a performer, and without which he is nothing. Thayer, in Jeremy Diddler, is more genteel than Barrett, but not half so ludicrous and laughable. The Diddler of the latter gentleman is a ne plus ultra, at least to our audience. Thayer's rank is one or two grades higher.

FINE ARTS.

NAPOLEON MUSING AT ST. HELENA.

The following is from the "London Mirror."

This picture has, we understand, been painted for Sir Robert Peel, whose taste and munificence in patronizing the fine arts cannot be too highly praised. It is throughout a masterly performance, and one of which the English school of art has just cause to be proud. We intend to let Mr. Hayden describe it in his own vivid style:

"Napoleon was peculiarly alive to poetical association as produced by scenery or sound: village bells with their echoing ding dong, now bursting full on the ear, now dying in the wind, affected him as they affect every body alive to natural impressions, and on the eve of all his great battles, you find him stealing away in the dead of the night, between the two hosts, and indulging in every species of poetical reverie.

"It was impossible to think of such a genius in captivity, without mysterious associations of the sky, the sea, the rock, and the solitude with which he was enveloped. I never imagined him but as if musing at dawn, or melancholy at sunset, listening at midnight to the beating and roaring of the Atlantic, or meditating as the stars gazed and the moon shone on him: in short, Napoleon never appeared to me but at those moments of silence and twilight, when nature seems to sympathize with the fallen, and when, if there be moments fit, in this turbulent earth, for celestial intercourse, one must imagine this would be a time immortal spirits might select to descend within the sphere of mortality, to soothe and comfort, to inspire and support the afflicted.

"Under such impressions, the present picture was produced.—I imagined him standing on the brow of an impending cliff, and musing on his past fortunes. I imagined sea-birds screaming at his feet—the sun just down—the sails of the guard-ship glittering on the horizon, and the Atlantic, calm, silent, awfully deep, and endlessly extensive.

"I tried it in a small sketch, and it was instantly purchased. I published a print, and the demand is now, and has been incessant; a commission for a picture the full size of life, from one well known as the friend of artists and patron of art, followed, and thus I have ventured to think a conception so unexpectedly popular might, on this enlarged scale, not be uninteresting to the public.

"No trouble has been spared to render the picture a resemblance; its height is Napoleon's exact height, according to Constant, his valet, viz. five feet two inches and three quarters, French, or five feet five inches and a half, English; the uniform is that of one of the regiments of Chasseurs, every detail has been dictated by an old officer of the regiment, and his celebrated hat has been faithfully copied from one of his own hats now in England.

"The best description I ever saw of Napoleon's appearance was in the letter of an Irish gentleman, named North, published in the Dublin Evening Post, and it is so very characteristic, it may amuse the visitor. He saw him at Elba, in 1814, and thus paints him:

"He but little resembles the notion I had of him, or any other man I ever saw. He is the squarest figure I think I ever remember to have seen, and exceedingly corpulent. His face is a perfect square from the effects of fat, and, as he has no whiskers, his jaw is thrown more into relief; this description, joined to his odd little three-cornered cocked hat, and very plain clothes, would certainly give him the appearance of a vulgar person, if the impression was not counteracted by his soldierly carriage, and the peculiar manner of his walking, which is confident, theatrical, and a little ruffian-like, for he stamps the ground at every step, and at the same time twists his body a little. He was dressed that day in a great coat, turned up with a dirty white, &c. His neck is short, his shoulders very broad, and his chest open. * * * His features are remarkably masculine, regular, and well formed. His skin is coarse, unwrinkled, and weather-beaten; his eyes possess a natural and unaffected fierceness, the most extraordinary I ever beheld; they are full, bright, and of a brassy color. He looked directly at me, and his stare is by far the most intense I ever beheld. This time, however, curiosity made me a match, for I vanquished him. It is when he regards you, that you mark the singular expression of his eyes; no frown, no ill-humour, no affectation of appearing terrible, but the general expression of an iron, inexorable temper."

We have only to remark, that the picture appears to us exceedingly well drawn, and equally colored. Objection has been made to the large size of the epaulettes, and the coloring of the sea. To the first opinion we may subscribe, but doubt whether the objection ought to extend to the latter, especially if we remember the great height of the cliff on which Napoleon stands; and the usual sober appearance of the ocean towards the last minute of sunset. The lower part of the figure, particularly the left leg, half advanced, is admirably drawn.

The effect of the picture, on the spectator entering the room, is one of the most extraordinary character. Its general outline—Napoleon standing on the crest of a tremendous cliff, with his back nearly turned to the spectator, the vast Atlantic, and the parting glow of the sun—the figure, too, the size of life, will, in some measure prepare him for this effect, which we confess ourselves at a loss to describe. Its very grandeur impresses us with awe, and our after-thought becomes tinged with melancholy from associating the fate of the illustrious original with the towering cliff, the vasty sea, the dying splendor of the sun, and the specky sail of the guard-ship fluttering in its last light. Yet how delightful is it to reflect that such effects are within the span of a few square yards of canvass, and how ennobling is the recollection that genius (ill-fostered as it has been in the case of the painter before us,) enables one man to produce such sublime and agreeable impressions on his fellows. To step from the busy paré of New Bond-street, and its ceaseless whirl of fashion to this placid mere of reflection, is a contrast almost too severe for some of the puling votaries of London gaiety; yet the scene teems with deep-souled poetry. Some such feelings as those so touchingly expressed in Lord Byron's Ode to Napoleon, on his first exile, flit through the memory:

"Then haste thee to thy sullen isle,
And gaze upon the sea:
That element may meet thy smile,—
It ne'er was ruled by thee!
Or trace with thine all-idle hand,
In loitering mood upon the sand,
That earth is now as free."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Revolution in the United States.—This civil war is of a literary nature. A person has stigmatized the amiable and accomplished author of Knickerbocker and the Sketch Book, as a toad-eater, a mere scribbler, and an apostate from his country! and a scene of inkshed has ensued, more amusing than dangerous. The proclaimer of this new creed in literature has provoked a pretty brisk fire upon himself from all quarters, and as he is likely to have the worst of the conflict, we see no occasion to enter the arena. But we must take leave to say that the wholesale abuse bestowed upon the most delightful of writers, and one so irreproachable in his private life, sounded in our ears strangely enough. What! Geoffry Crayon, the enchanter, over whose conjurations we have hung captivated for hours and hours, a scribbler? Honest old Deidrich Knickerbocker—the gravest of historians—the most dignified of Dutchmen, whose matchless pen has immortalized the golden age of the city of Manahatta—the painter of Walter the Doubter, of Hard Kopping Piet, of the magnificent Von Puffenburge, and the jolly Anthony Van Corlear—excellent old Deidrich Knickerbocker, a mere scribbler! He, who has devoted himself to the biography of the discoverer of his country, and given to the world a book as graceful and interesting in its delineations as it will be durable in its fame, a toad-eater? In good truth, this is an age of revolutions. It is curious too, and we wonder that the enthusiastic belligerents in this little literary warfare should have overlooked the fact, that the very occasion which has elicited this wanton attack upon Mr. Irving, and that too during his absence, was one which in itself affords a striking contradiction to the principal charge. It was in defending the character of one of his own countrymen that he has exposed himself to the rancorous and indiscriminating bigotry of party feeling! His assailant sneers at him for not "having had any party spirit!" If the author of "the namby pamby" Sketch Book, had been the obsequious tool of a party, if he had been habituated to grovel in its filthy schemes and narrow distinctions, and grown as callous to slanders himself as unabashed in inventing them against others—and this for some paltry office—some clerkship—and salary, earned by the sweat of his brow at the most degrading of labor, we should trouble ourselves little about his quarrels. But Mr. Irving is no politician. His shoulders are not used to the lash; and although his fame cannot by any probability be even for a moment obscured by this piece of gratuitous impertinence, we cannot refrain, for our own sakes, from protesting temperately, but most earnestly, as we have often done before, against the character of vulgarity and coarseness which in many instances disgraces the American press. That it is the shameful custom of the country is the only apology, and that a timely one, which we can discover for this editor of the Richmond Whig.

An eye to business.—The following anecdote is told in a recent Scotch paper:—"The late Mr. R., when minister of Inchture, had a heavy share in one of the Dundee whalers. One season the vessel was missing, and thought to be lost. On a Sabbath morning the news reached Inchture that the missing whaler had come safely in. As usual the beadle was in attendance to usher the minister into the pulpit; while on his way through the church-yard, he turned round, with a face full of importance, and said, 'Sir, the whaal ship's come in.' 'Hold your peace, John,' replied the minister, with a frown, 'how dars you speak to me about whale ships on the Lord's day?' The poor beadle was quite crest-fallen at this rebuke; however, when he was opening the door, the minister said, archly, 'Hark ye, man! any fish?' 'I dinna ken an it be right to speak about fish on the Lord's day, but they say she is a bumper ship.' 'Is she faith!' exclaimed the clergyman, striking his cane on the ground. The news raised his spirits so far above their ordinary tone, that his hearers declared they never heard him so lively either before or after."

Fugitive Poetry.—The annexed lines, which have been standing for several weeks in type—are precisely of that sort at the perusal of which we are apt to indulge in a good-natured smile, and say, "Oh! how well they do these things in London!" They are, however, from the pen of Mr. Whittier, editor of the New-England Review.

THE STRANGER.

I saw him, Lucy, only once,
As down the lighted hall,
We moved to music happily;
A stranger to us all;
A stranger, with a pale white brow,
And dark and meaning eye,
Which flashed like lightning on my own,
Whene'er he passed me by.

That soul-lit eye! it haunts me still!
So passionately deep,
Like those which sometimes beam on us
In visions of our sleep;
So sad as if some shadowing grief
Had o'er his spirit gone,
Yet brightening as if it caught
The answer of my own!

I knew him not—yet even when
I turned me from the dance,
I saw his dark eye follow me,
It could not be by chance:
I knew him not—and yet his tones
Were breathed upon my ear,
So sweetly low and musical
I could not choose but hear.

He spoke of sunny Italy,
Of Venice and her isles,
Of dark mustachio'd cavaliers,
And fair signoras' smiles;
Of music melting on the sea,
Of moonlight upon bowers,
Of fair hands wreathing sliken curls,
With gay and pleasant flowers!
And when he spoke of lovely ones,
Or praised a soul-like eye,
His deep full glance was fixed on mine,
As if it sought reply:
The flush was deepened on my cheek,
My voice grew faint and low,
I trembled at his earnest gaze,
'Twas foolishness I know!

We parted at my father's door,
The moonlight sweetly shone,
And I was standing at his side,
My arm was on his own:
He sighed, dear Lucy, how he sighed,
My eyes grew strangely dim,
It pained my heart to hear him sigh,
I could have wept for him!

He spoke of disappointed hope,
Of dreams that faded soon,
The dew-drops of life's joyous morn,
Which vanish'd ere its noon:
He spoke of loneliness of heart,
Of weariness and pain,
And murmur'd that a life like his
Was desolate and vain!

He said his father's castle frowned
Upon a foreign shore,
(A castle, Lucy, think of that,
He is a Count or more!)
That solitude was in its halls,
Chill, prison-like, and lone,
Ungladdened by the smile of love,
Or woman's kindly tone.

And then, dear Lucy, blame me not,
We wept with one another,
You would yourself have pitied him,
And loved him as a brother:
So handsome and so sorrowful,
So haughty, yet so kind;
Oh dear—I cannot keep his look
One moment from my mind.

He pressed my hand at parting,
And to-night he will be here,
While Ra is at his game of chess,
And Ma is nowhere near;
Excuse me, dearest Lucy, now,
Indeed I cannot write;
To-morrow, I will tell you more,
He will be here to-night.

P. S.—Oh, dearest Lucy, pity me,
I really think I am dying,
My heart is like a heart of lead,
My eyes are red with crying,
But yesterday the bank was robbed,
And of a large amount,
My father tried the robber,
And, oh Lord! it was my Count!

THE KNIGHT WITH A SNOWY PLUME.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY—COMPOSED BY H. R. BISHOP.

Marziale e lento assai.

There came from the wars on a jet black steed, A knight with a snow-y plume;

He flew o'er the heath, like a cap-tive freed From a dun-geon's drear-y gloom.

2d verse.—And gaily he rode to his lordly home,
But the tow'rs were dark and dim;
And he heard no reply, when he call'd for some
Who were dearer than life to him.

3d verse.—The gate, which was hurl'd from the ancient place,
Lay mould'ring on the bare ground;
And the knight rush'd in, but he saw not a trace
Of a friend, as he gazed around!

4th verse.—He flew to the grove, where his mistress' lute
Had charm'd him with love's sweet tone;
But 'twas desolate now, and the strings were mute,
And she, he adored, was gone.

5th verse.—The wreaths were all dead in Rosalie's bow'r,
And Rosalie's dove was lost;
And the wintry wind, had wither'd each flow'r
On the myrtle she valued most.

6th verse.—But a cypress grew, where the myrtle's bloom
Once scent'd the morning air,
And under its shade was a marble tomb,
And Rosalie's name was there!

JUNE.

THE heat of the early part of June has been that of midsummer, the thermometer ranging between eighty-five and ninety in the shade. If there are any who can keep themselves cool "by thinking on the frosty Caucasus," they have now an ample opportunity to exercise their imagination. Umbrellas, parasols, white pantaloons, and formidable-looking broad-rimmed hats of the same color, are the general but inadequate artifices by which the panting and dripping citizens strive to ameliorate the effects of the fiery sun. Now do newspaper-carriers, post-boys, cartmen, stage-drivers, glass-blowers, blacksmiths, and steam-engine men, and all other unfortunate laborers, whose duties call them abroad during the raging heat of the day, wipe their drenched foreheads, and sorely lament their fate; while shoemakers, tailors, editors and other literary men, congratulate themselves upon their sedentary occupations, and ply their languid tasks, dismantled of every superfluous habiliment. The theatres are deserted. Burke plays to empty boxes; and even Cinderella, the opera of operas, has abandoned the field, after forty victories, like a prudent general, shielding his forces from the fury of the elements, and awaiting a more favorable opportunity for his subsequent attacks. Now when fat men meet each other in the street do they no more inquire "what's the news?" but pausing, peradventure, beneath the shade of an awning, or the angle of a house, do take off their hats, pass their handkerchiefs over their steaming heads, inform each other that "it's very hot weather," ask "how is the thermometer?" and learn that it has reached at least one hundred and twenty-six in the shade! Strangers from the south, who have visited us in order to enjoy the northern temperature, suspect they have taken much pains to little purpose; the man who keeps the ice-cream garden is more envied than the president of the United States, while they who sleep in attics are objects of compassion. Now, too, is the human race, the boasted lords of the creation, rendered unhappy in spirit by the impertinent familiarities of the vile, detested, execrable musketo, which puts whole theories of stoical philosophy to flight with the touch of his sting, which brings the flash of impatience and anger into heavenly faces, and causes to shrink the burly soldier, who would walk up to the cannon's mouth as carelessly as curl his whiskers.

Now the opening summer alters the aspect of the city's amusements. Mr. Rabineau, the patron of salt water bathing, "for a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," contributes largely to the comfort of whole droves of very warm persons of the masculine gender; while Niblo, who is said to have possessed himself of the genuine Aladdin's lamp, mentioned in a certain voracious history, has conjured up a little Eden, in the very bosom of this dusty and business-driving town. A single gaze beneath any of the dunstables, which there demurely shade the very loveliest of faces, repays the poetical and perspiring young man for all the hardships of the day. In truth, this captivating promenade attracts crowds of the gay and beautiful, when, as the music of the Boston band sends happiness and inspiration through every vein, he is "fit for treasons" who could do otherwise than fall desperately in love, at least a dozen times, with the radiant eyes, the slender feet, the graceful figures, and all the et ceteras which there glide beneath the illumined arches, and through the shadowy groves.

Another favorite resort is Hoboken, whither literary gentlemen, who are in funds, may be conveyed in a boat for the sum of six and a quarter cents. A gratification so delightful, and also so cheap, it may be easily imagined is participated in by many. Crowds of miscellaneous specimens of mortality thither throng to snuff a breath of air, to luxuriate in the elevating contemplation of rural scenery, and to refresh themselves with pound-cake and carbonated mead. Here venerable gray-headed politicians inhale the pure air, rendered more agreeable by a goodly mixture of brandy and water, and, amusing themselves with many jokes, do puff forth volumes of fragrant tobacco smoke, which passes away upon the breeze—forgetful the while that even thus fleets their own almost ended existence. It is pleasant for the thoughtful, and, peradventure, melancholy man, sick of business and the misery and guilt of the world, to recline on the cool and verdant hill, beneath the outspreading branches, with the vast city stretched out quietly and beautifully before him in the distance, at that soft hour when

"The weary sun hath made a golden set,
And, by the bright track of his fiery car,
Gives token of a goodly day to-morrow."

Then doth he note the group of sweet children, just starting forth upon the threshold of life, all unconscious of the future, and never dreaming but that the whole world is just as bright and gay as the present scene. Even while their laughter delights his ear will he remember the words of the poet:

"Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond to-day.
Yet see how all around them wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black misfortune's baleful train,
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey, the murderous band!
Ah, tell them, they are men!"

"Lo, in the vale of years beneath
A grisly troop are seen,
The painful family of death,
More hideous than their queen:
This racks the joints, this fires the veins,
That every laboring sinew strains,
Those in the deeper vital rage:
Lo, poverty, to fill the band,
That numbers the soul with icy hand,
And slow-consuming age."

"To each his sufferings: all are men,
Condemn'd alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
The unfeeling for his own.
Yet ah! why should they know their fate?
Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies.
Thought would destroy their paradise.
No more; where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise."

LINES ON A LADY'S GLOVE.

Had I the sweetest, softest lyre
That ever thrill'd an angel's ear,
I'd waken from its tend'ring wire
The wildest note, if thou wouldst hear.
Then may I never laugh or love,
If e'er I leave untouched the string,
When that fair hand has thrown the glove,
And freely challenged me to sing.
And had that glove the fingers clothed
That some detested bribe had stained,
That ever pressed the hand they loathed,
Or wrote one word that truth profaned;
That e'er denied to mis'ry's claim
What heaven and nature bid us pay—
Oh! never its unworthy name
Should soil the honor of my lay.
Far other functions of delight
This blest disguise is formed to know,
To veil the tender arm at night
From the rude air and ruder beau:
(That arm wherein the lucid veins,
Poured from the fount of virtue, stray,
And beautify the snowy plains
Through which they wind their purple way:)
Those fingers to protect and cheer
That oft the lyre have wrapt in wo,
Nor stay'd to dry the trickling tear
Their own soft art had caused to flow.
With that kind hand in fame to live,
And kiss unblamed the bounteous part,
Whose favorite office is to give,
Whose dearest gift its owner's heart.

THE ENGRAVING.

VIEW OF TORRE DI QUINTO, NEAR ROME.

Drawn by Weir—Engraved by Hatch & Smillie.

THE beautiful view which ornaments our present number, is taken from a drawing of our young countryman Weir, who studied some time at Rome, and now resides in this city. Mr. Weir possesses fine natural genius, and his taste has been greatly improved by an acquaintance with the best models. We have seen many of his delineations of Italian scenery which would do credit to any living artist, and which could not fail to bring him into conspicuous notice in any country where a mature and discriminating taste for the arts existed. There is, however, a time for all things, and a day will assuredly come, when the United States, without degenerating into the effeminate and slavish habits and manners of Italy, may borrow from her a proper and becoming taste for her music, her painting, and her architecture. All these arts originated and attained to their highest perfection when Italy, if not free in her institutions, was at least independent of foreign oppressors; and there is nothing in the history of mankind that does not distinctly indicate the eternal and inseparable union of the highest degree of liberty with the most splendid triumphs of genius. In a free and enlightened country, the patronage of the public, while it is equally a source of profit to merit, is certainly far more desirable than that of a king or a noble, which carries with it an appearance of degradation, or at least dependence. To prove that there is not in republicanism or its institutions, any necessary indifference or neglect of the arts, we might instance the sums voted by the congress of the United States to Colonel Trumbull for his three national pictures, which far exceed any remuneration that Raphael, or Titian, or Dominichino ever received for the same number of works painted for emperors, popes, princes or cardinals, although some of these have since been sold for much greater sums. It is on record that Dominichino was paid by some Macenas of a cardinal, about the value of twelve or thirteen guineas for his picture of St. Jerome, considered the third greatest in the world! We thank our stars this cardinal was not a republican, or we might never have heard the last of the barbarous indifference of a free people towards the arts and elegancies of life. Thus much for rewards. As to honors, we read that Titian, when employed in painting the likeness of Charles the Fifth, was allowed to sit down in his royal presence.

The people, we mean the respectable classes of the Christian nations of the present age, certainly exhibit no want of a disposition to foster and encourage literature and the arts, so far as they ought to be encouraged without entirely taking the lead of more necessary and indispensable pursuits and occupations of life. For ourselves, we wish to see them take deep root in the United States; but at the same time, we would not purchase them by the sacrifice of a manly spirit of independence. If they cannot flourish as they once did in Italy, without entailing upon us the fate of Italy; if they cannot harmonize with the blessings of freedom, nor attain to celebrity without the sunshine of royal patronage, let them perish. It is better to be without a Raphael, a Palladio, a Michael Angelo, or a Canova, than a Washington, a Jefferson, or a Madison; nor would we exchange the temple of liberty for St. Peter's at Rome—the fair reality of a happy, free, and prosperous people, for the finest landscape of Claude, or even the transfiguration itself. A race of freemen is worth a dozen Apollos, and the goddess of liberty is more beautiful in our eyes than the Venus di Medici.

But there is nothing in the experience of the past to discourage the belief, that a due and proper encouragement of the fine arts is compatible with the enjoyment of a rational liberty. The beau idéal of the social state would be that which combined the enjoyment of perfect political freedom, and an equal dispensation of the means of happiness, with the refinements of manners, and all the embellishments of the arts. But such a state of things is out of the question. All that can be done or ought to be aimed at in this country, is, to inculcate just so much of a taste for the arts as is consistent with that primitive hardihood and simplicity which is essential to the possession, the enjoyment, and the protection of our institutions.

We intended to have presented our subscribers at this time with a view of Wall-street. The drawing was accordingly completed and placed in the hands of an artist, but when the plate was finished, it was so badly executed, that we resolved to substitute the present one, being determined that none shall hereafter appear in the Mirror but such as at least equal the best of American engravings; we therefore preferred to make a selection from the portfolio of Mr. Weir, from numerous sketches taken by him on the spot. The drawing of Wall-street, however, has been committed to the skill of one, whose former efforts and well-established reputation are a sufficient guarantee that it will be done in a superior style. In the course of the next volume the engraving will be published. The "Torre de Quinto," which accompanies this impression, was drawn in 1827. It is an old castle about five miles from Rome, situated on a little hill in the centre of a valley, about three miles from any other habitation, and is commonly called "Poussin's Castle," from the fact, that he frequently introduced it in his pictures. It had formerly a moat and draw-bridge, and was probably built in the time of the crusades, but for what purpose is unknown. It is sometimes used by goat-herds for the shelter of their flocks, and sometimes by banditti, for the latter of whom it is more appropriate, as it is almost entirely in ruins. The surrounding country is hilly and sandy, and is nearly destitute of vegetation.

It is singular that this castle should be almost entirely unknown even by the natives in the vicinity of Rome, and equally strange that no account should be extant, not even a tradition, respecting its original owners and objects. Left thus entirely to itself, the imagination associates with it a thousand tales of romance and chivalry. How many of those knights, renowned in story, have reined their steeds beneath its walls, and thence departed for the Holy Land. What high-wrought scenes of love or hate—what princely banquets and dazzling throngs of the gay, the brave, and the beautiful have been within its now crumbling and deserted chambers! As the representation of a structure so mysterious and interesting, this view will, we hope, afford gratification to our readers; but we publish it also as a fair specimen of the progress which the art has made in this country. Smillie and Hatch, by whom it was executed, clearly evince their great excellence as artists, and may claim the honor of having produced one of the very best engravings which has ever been issued in the United States. We are also pleased to add, that the spirit of liberal encouragement generally manifested towards works of taste and elegance of this description is attended with a corresponding industry, competition, and improvement among the artists and publishers. Those of our countrymen who have devoted themselves to this branch of the arts, whatever may be said to the contrary, dwell in an age and country affording a fine field for their exertions, and where perseverance, application, and talent cannot fail to obtain an ample reward.

ORIGINAL TALES.

JONATHAN'S VISIT TO THE CELESTIAL EMPIRE.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

SOMEWHERE about the year 1783, Jonathan, a young fellow who lived away down east, took it into his head to make a voyage to Canton. Accordingly he fitted out his sloop, a tarnation clever vessel of about eighty tons, and taking a crazy old compass for his guide, his two cousins, one a lad about sixteen, and a great Newfoundland dog for his crew, and a couple of rusty revolutionary swords for an armament, he boldly set forth on a voyage to the celestial empire.

Jonathan was a mighty cute lad, and had read a little or so about the great devotion of the Chinese to the herb called ginseng, which every body knows is a remedy for all things. He happened one day to hear an Indian doctor give it as his opinion that a certain plant which grew in the neighborhood of Jonathan's natale solum, was very much like the famous Chinese panacea, as he had seen it described. He took a hint from this, and rather guessed he would carry a good parcel along with him on speculation. Accordingly he gathered a few hundred weight, dried, and stowed it away in one of his lockers, under the cabin floor.

Providence, which seems to take special care of such droll fellows as Jonathan, who calculate pretty considerably on their native energies, blessed him with fair winds and good weather; his old compass behaved to admiration; his old chart, which had been torn into fifty thousand pieces and pasted on a bit of tarpaulin, proved a most infallible guide; and, some how or other, he could not exactly tell how, he plumped his sloop right into Table Bay, just as if the old fellow had been there a hundred times before.

The Dutch harbor-master was sitting under his hat on his piazza, when he beheld, through the smoke of his pipe, this strange apparition of a vessel, scudding like a bird into the bay. He took it for the famous Flying Dutchman, and such was his trepidation, that he stuck his pipe into his button-hole without knocking out the ashes, whereby he burnt a hole in his waistcoat. When Jonathan rounded to, and came to anchor, the harbor-master ventured to go on board to get information concerning this strange little barque. He could talk English, Dutch fashion, for indeed he had been promoted to the office on account of his skill in languages.

"Whence came you, Mynheer?" quoth he.

"Right off the reel from old Salem, I guess," replied Jonathan.

"Old Salem—whereabouts is dat den? I tont know any sich place about here."

"I guess not. What's your name, squire?"

"Hans Ollenbockenoffenhaffengraphensteiner ish my name."

"Whew! why it's as long as a pumpkin vine—now aint it?"

"But whereabouts ish dish blashe you speague of?" reiterated the harbor-master.

"O, it's some way off—about six or eight thousand miles down west there."

"Six tousand duvels!" muttered Hans with the long name. "Do you tink I vill pelieve such a cog and pullsh tory as dat, Mynheer?"

"If you don't believe me, ask my two cousins there—and if you don't believe them, ask my dog. I tell you I come right straight from old Salem, in the United States of Amer-rykey."

"United Sthaites of vat? I never heard of any United Sthaites but de Sthaites of Hollant."

"Ah—I suppose not—they've jist been christened. I 'spose now, likely you've never heard of the new world neither, have you, mister—what's your name?"

"Hans Ollenbockenoffenhaffengraphensteiner—I told you zo pefore."

"Maybe you'll have to tell me again before I know it by heart, I calculate. But did you never hear of the new world, squire?"

"Not I—ant if I hat, I wouldn't hafe pelieved it. Taro ish no new worlt zinne de tiscovary of de Cabe of Goot Hoop dat I know. Put, come along, you must co vid me to de gub-ernador."

Jonathan puzzled the governor about as much as he had done the harbor-master. But his papers were all fair and above board, and the governor had not only heard of the new world but of the United States of Amerrikey, as Jonathan called them. Accordingly he was permitted to enjoy all the privileges of the port.

Nothing could exceed the curiosity and wonder excited by the vessel among the people at the Cape. That she should have made a voyage of so many thousand miles, with such a crew and such an outfit, was, in their opinion, little less than miraculous, and the worthy governor could only account for it by the aid of witchcraft, which, he had somewhere heard, abounded in the new world. Jonathan was the greatest man, and his dog the greatest dog at the Cape. He dined with the governor and the burgomasters; cracked his jokes with their wives and daughters, danced with the Hottentots, and might have married a rich Dutch damsel of five hundred weight, and five thousand ducats a year, provided he would have given up old Salem forever.

After partaking of the hospitalities of the Cape a few days, Jonathan began to be in a hurry to prosecute his voyage. He knew the value of time as well as money. On the sixth day he accordingly set sail amid the acclamations of the inhabitants, taking with him a hippopotamus, an ourang-outang, and six ring-tailed monkeys, all of which he had bought on speculation. One of his cousins had, however, been so smitten with the country about the Cape, or with the charms of a little Dutch maiden, that he determined to stay behind, marry, and improve the inhabitants—on speculation. A Dutch sailor offered to supply his place, but Jonathan declined, saying he guessed his other cousin and the Newfoundland dog, who was a pretty particular cute kritter, could sail his sloop quite round the world and back again.

Not much of interest occurred during the voyage until he arrived at Macao, where he excited the same astonishment, underwent the same scrutiny, returned the same satisfactory answers, and came off as triumphantly as he did at the Cape of Good Hope. While here, he saw every thing, inquired about every thing, and went every where. Among other adventures he one day accompanied his cousin in a fishing-boat, to see if they fished as the people did on the banks of Newfoundland. Unfortunately a violent storm came on; some of the boats were lost, and their crews drowned. The survivors went and offered up some of their paddles at the great temple of Neang-ma-ko. Those that were able, added some matches and gilt paper. Jonathan's other cousin here determined to stay behind at Macao. It occurred to him he might make a speculation by curing the fish after the manner of mackerel. Jonathan did not much like this, but he said "never mind, I partly guess I can do without him."

Jonathan had now no one but his Newfoundland dog to assist in the navigation of his sloop. But he thought to himself, his voyage was almost at an end, and, at all events, if he hired any of the Macao people, they would be offering up matches and gilt paper to Neang-ma-ko, instead of minding their business. So he set sail for Canton, the Chinese prognosticating he would go to the bottom, because he did not make an offering to Neang-ma-ko, and the Portuguese that he would go to the devil, because he did not pay his devoirs to the virgin.

At Lin-Tin he was taken for a smuggler of opium by some, and for a magician by others, when they saw his vessel, heard where he hailed from, and became convinced that his whole crew consisted of a Newfoundland dog. The commander of the fleet of ships of war stationed at Lin-Tin, to prevent the smuggling of opium into the celestial empire, seized the sloop, and devoted its brave commander to the indignation of the mighty emperor, who is brother to the sun and moon. Hereupon Jonathan bethought himself of a piece of the herb he had brought with him and had in his pocket. "It is a mighty good chance," thought he, "to try if it's the identical thing." Accordingly he took a convenient opportunity of presenting to the valiant commander a bit about as big as his finger. The admiral, whose name was Tizzy-Wizzy-Twang-Lang, stared at him at first with astonishment, then at the present with almost dismay, and thrusting it into his pocket, immediately caused it to be proclaimed that the "foreign barbarian" was innocent of the crime, or the intention of smuggling opium, and might go any where he pleased. Tizzy-Wizzy-Twang-Lang then sat down and wrote a despatch to the governor of Canton, stating that he had routed the "foreign barbarians," destroyed their fleet, and thrown all their opium overboard. After which he shut himself up in his cabin and took a morsel of the treasure Jonathan had presented him, about as large as the head of a pin. It is astonishing how much better he felt afterwards.

In the mean while Jonathan had set sail, and was ploughing his way towards Canton, with a fair wind and a good prospect of making a great speculation, for he had ascertained to a certainty that the article he had brought with him was the real ginseng, which was worth five times its weight in gold. He went ashore at the village of Ho-tun, where he saw the people catching wild ducks and geese, which they fatten by feeding in the dark. "That's a good hint," said Jonathan, shutting one eye, "and I'll tell the folks at old Salem." While he was walking about, seeing into every thing, he was unexpectedly saluted by a shower of stones from a parcel of children with their hair sticking up behind like two horns. Jonathan thought this tarnation ungentle, but he prudently suppressed his anger, considering he was in a strange country, and was come to try his fortune.

"May I be buttered," quoth Jonathan, as he approached Canton, and saw the countless boats moored in streets on the river, or flitting about in every direction—"May I be buttered if here isn't a city all afloat. This beats all nater!"

And sure enough, here was a scene that might have made one of our Indians wonder. The whole world seemed on the water. Junks, with two eyes staring at the bows—canal-boats, flower-boats, pleasure-boats, and boats of all sizes and descriptions, filled with all sorts of people, lay moored in regular streets, or were moving about to and fro in every direction, painted in all the colors of the rainbow, and ornamented with gold leaf and grinning monsters having no prototypes in nature, or any where else but in the grotesque imagination of the artists of the celestial empire.

The busy activity of some of these boats was singularly contrasted with the luxurious ease of others, in which might be seen a couple of Chinese dandies reclining on mats and resting their heads on bamboo pillows, with pipes in their mouths, either listlessly contemplating the scene before them, or gazing with lack-lustre eye on the picture of some favorite beauty with penciled eyebrows, nails like a tiger, and feet almost invisible. Others were performing the ceremony of chin-chin-jos, which consists in throwing bits of burning paper into the water, while the din of innumerable gongs contributed a species of music to the scene that made honest Jonathan stop his ears in reverential dismay.

When our adventurer moored his sloop at Whampoa, in the midst of a fleet of vast ships, of almost all the nations of Europe, they did not know what to make of her. All he could say failed in convincing them that he had come from such a long distance, in such a vessel, navigated by such a crew. Besides, what could have brought him to Canton? He had neither money to purchase, nor cargo to exchange for Chinese commodities, except it might be his river-horse, his ourang-outang, and his monkeys.

Jonathan kept his own secret. He had heard that the Chinese were as sharp as the "leete end of nothing whittled down," and determined to be as sharp as the best of them. Accordingly nothing could be got out of him, except that he had come on his own bottom, and meant to turn a penny some how or other. He said nothing about his ginseng, which he had, as I before stated, stowed away in a secret locker.

The story of the strange man and the strange vessel that had been navigated from the new world by a man and a dog, made a great noise, and thousands flocked to see them. The gentleman who officiated as American consul, without, however, having a regular appointment, behaved in the most kind and friendly manner to Jonathan, and introduced him to a hong, or, as our hero called him, a hung-merchant, who undertook to do his business for him, that is, if he had any to do, which seemed rather doubtful.

"I chin-chin you," said Fat-qua, the hongman.

"You don't now, do you?" quoth Jonathan. "Well then, I chin-chin you, and so we are even, I guess."

Fat-qua was very anxious to know all about Jonathan's business, but the Chinese were such plaguy slippery fellows, he was afraid to trust him with his secret. He, therefore, very gravely, and with infinite simplicity, commended to him his cargo of live stock, begged he would dispose of them to the best advantage, and invest the proceeds in a cargo of notions. Fat-qua did not know whether to laugh or be angry—however, he concluded by laughing, and promising to do his best.

The trifle which Jonathan brought with him had been all expended in maintaining himself and his dog, and Fat-qua did not feel inclined to advance any on the security of his live stock. This being the case, Jonathan one day brought a pound or two of his ginseng, and asked him carelessly what it might be likely worth in these parts?

"Hi yah!" exclaimed the hong-merchant in astonishment. "No, have got some more of he—hi yah!"

"Some small matter—not much," said Jonathan, who was of opinion if he displayed the whole parcel at once, it might lower the price and injure his speculation.

Fat-qua disposed of the two pounds of ginseng for a thumping sum, which Jonathan pocketed in less than no time, and chuckled in his sleeve, as he thought of the means to get rid of the whole at the same rate. A day or two after, he delivered the hong-merchant a few pounds more, which he said he had accidentally found in a place where he had stowed away and forgot it.

"Hi yah! Missee Joe Notting, I chin-chin you." And he began to have a great respect for Missee Joe Notting.

In this way, by slow degrees, did friend Jonathan bring forth his hoard of hidden treasures, till it was all disposed of, and he found himself in possession of almost half a million of dollars; for, it is to be recollected, this happened long before the value of ginseng was brought down to almost nothing by the large quantities carried to China in consequence of the successful speculation of Jonathan.

Every time he produced a new lot, he declared it was all he had left, and consequently, to the last moment, the price was kept up. Fat-qua began to believe that Joe Notting had discovered some hidden place where it grew, in the neighborhood of Canton, or that he dealt with the prince of darkness. He accordingly caused him to be watched, but our hero was too wide awake for the hong-merchant.

"Hi yah! Missee Joe Notting—some yet more—when you shall think shall you no more have—hey? Every day here come you—say the last is he—hi yah! I think no last come forever."

"I hain't another stick to save my gizzard," said Jonathan, and this time he spoke like a man of honor. He had at last sold out his hoard, with the exception of a small parcel for presents, and to use on an emergency.

Jonathan was now thinking he would gather himself together, and point his bowsprit strut towards home. But first he determined to see about him, for he expected to be asked a heap of questions when he got amongst his old neighbors; and not be able to tell them all about the celestial empire, would be to show he had little or no gumption.

He accordingly visited the famous flower garden of Fa-Tee, where he saw a vast collection of the most beautiful flowers, and roses of all colors. Returning, he passed through the suburb of Ho-Nam, where he was called Fan-kwei, which means "foreign devil," and pelted handsomely with stones, according to the hospitable custom of the inhabitants.

Jonathan was now so rich, that he felt himself a different man from what he was when the boys pelted him at the village of Ho-tun. He had moreover seen the bamboo so liberally employed on the backs of the Chinese by their own officers and magistrates, that he thought he might make use himself of this universal panacea for all offences in the celestial empire. Accordingly, he sallied forth among these inhospitable rogues, and plied his stick so vigorously that the rabble fled before him, crying out "Fan-kwei!" and making motions significant of cutting off the head, as much as to say that would be his end at last. The reader must know that beheading is considered the most disgraceful of all punishments in the celestial empire, where they do every thing differently from the rest of the world.

A formal complaint was laid before the Gan-chat-sze, a minister of justice at Canton, against the Fan-kwei, who had feloniously bamboozed the mob of Ho-Nam. Fat-qua, one of our hero's securities, was taken into custody till his forthcoming, and an express sent off to Peking to announce the intelligence to the brother of the sun and moon, that a Fan-kwei had beaten at least two hundred of his valiant and invincible subjects, who could not bring themselves to soil their fingers by touching even the clothes of a foreign barbarian.

Jonathan was soon arrested, and, being carried before the illustrious Gan-chat-sze, was astonished at seeing the infinite mischief he had done. There was one poor man who had his eye put out; another his head fractured; a third his arm broken; and, what was worse than all this, three children were so disabled that they could not stand, all by Jonathan's bamboo, which was about as thick as your finger.

This was a serious business for a Fan-kwei. But his friend Fat-qua whispered in his ear—

"Hi yah—Missee Joe Notting—you some more have got of that grand—Hi yah! You stand under me—hey?"

Jonathan tipped him a knowing wink, and Fat-qua then crept close to the ear of the incorruptible Gan-chat-sze, and whispered him in like manner; but what he said being only intended for the ear of justice, must not be disclosed. The effect, however, was miraculous, the Gan-chat-sze forthwith started up in a mighty passion, and, seizing his bamboo, attacked the complainants in the suit with such wonderful vigor, that he actually performed a miracle, and restored every one of them to the use of their limbs. After this, he discharged the offender with a caution, which Fat-qua translated into excellent English, and the next day Jonathan sent him by the hands of the same discreet friend a pound of gin-seng.

"Hi yah! Missee Joe—more some yet, hey! Believe him make him as him go along.—Hi yah! Chin-chin you, Missee Joe Notting."

Fat-qua was determined to signalize this triumph of Chinese justice over prejudice against foreigners, by a great feast of bears-claws, birds-nests, and all the delicacies of the east. He, therefore, invited a number of the Fan-kweis about the Factory, to meet Jonathan at his country-seat, near the gardens of Fa-Tee, and they had a jolly time of it. Our hero was complimented with a pair of chop-sticks of the most elegant construction and materials, which he managed with such skill, that, by the time the dinner was over, he was well nigh starved to death.

The "hung-merchant" Fat-qua, was a jolly little fellow, "about knee high to a toad," as Jonathan used to say, and fond of a good glass of wine. He plied his guests pretty neatly, until they began to feel a little top-heavy, and sailed away one by one under rather high steam, leaving Jonathan and his friend alone together, the latter fast asleep. Jonathan was by this time in high feather, and thought this would be a good time to take a peep at the establishment of his friend, that he might know something of these matters when he got home.

He arose without disturbing the little fat gentleman, and proceeded to penetrate into the interior of the house, until he came to the female apartments, in one of which he saw a young lady smoking, to whom he paid his compliments with a low bow. Her pipe was formed of slender pieces of bamboo, highly polished, with a bowl of silver and a mouth-piece of amber. Her hair was beautifully long and tastefully dressed with flowers and gold and silver bodkins, and the whole atmosphere of the room was perfumed with jasmine and other odoriferous plants and shrubs. By her side lay a guitar, on which she seemed to have been playing.

The entrance of Jonathan threw her into great confusion, and she uttered several violent screams, which however brought no one to her assistance. The illustrious Fat-qua was still sleeping in his seat, and the servants making merry as usual with the remains of the feast. Jonathan attempted an apology for his intrusion, but the more he apologized the louder the young lady screamed. Jonathan wondered what could be the matter with her.

"Well, I never saw any thing like this growing among corn—what's come over the gal? May I be chiselled if I don't think she's afraid I'll eat her. But why the dickens, if she's frightened, don't she scamper off, that being the most natural way of getting out of danger?" Jonathan did not know the feet of the poor young damsel were not more than two inches and a half long, and that she could no more run than fly. They were what the Chinese poets call a couple of "golden lilies."

Encouraged by this notion, that her pretending to be frightened was all sheer affectation, he approached her still nearer, took up the guitar, and begged her to play him a tune, such as "Yankee Doodle," or any thing of that sort that was pretty easily managed, for he did not much admire any of your fine fashionable gimcracks. Jonathan was a plaguy neat kind of a chap—as handsome a lad as might be seen; tall, and straight, with blue eyes, white forehead, and red cheeks, a little rusted to be sure with the voyage.

The pretty creature with the little feet, whose name was Shangtshee, ventured at last to look at this impudent intruder, and, sooth to say, he did not appear so terrible at the second glance as at the first. She smiled, and put out her small foot for Jonathan to admire. She then took her guitar and played him a tune—it was not "Yankee Doodle" to be sure, but it rather pleased Jonathan, for he declared it beat all, he'd be switched if it did not. Shangtshee seemed to understand the compliment, for she smiled and put out her other golden lily, I suppose to show Jonathan she had a pair of them. Jonathan admired the pipe; she handed it to him, he put it to his lips, and giving it back again, she put it to her lips, which our hero finally concluded came as near to kissing as two-pence to a groat.

"How the kitter blushes," thought Jonathan. He did not know she was painted half an inch thick after the fashion of the Chinese ladies. As they sat thus exchanging little civilities, which, innocent as they were, endangered their lives, they were alarmed, at least the lady—for Jonathan had never particularly studied Chinese customs—by the sound of a guitar, at some short distance in the garden. It approached nearer, and, in a few minutes, seemed directly under the window of the apartment. Shangtshee appeared greatly agitated, and begged Jonathan by signs to depart the way he came. But Jonathan had no notion of being scared by a tune, and declined to budge an inch. It was a nice tune, and he didn't much mind if he heard another just like it.

Presently the music ceased, and all at once the young Shangtshee screamed a scream almost as loud as the former ones. "What can have got into the curious varmint now, I wonder?" quoth Jonathan. He little suspected she had caught a glimpse of the face of her lover through the blinds. This young man was called Yu-min-hoo, which signifies feathered, because he was a great poet, and took such high flights that his meaning was sometimes quite out of sight. He always carried an ink-bottle suspended to his button, a bamboo pen stuck behind his ear, and a book under his arm, in which he wrote down his thoughts that none might escape him. He made verses upon Shangtshee, in which he compared her to a dish of bears-claws, since her nails were at least six inches long, and she was a delicacy which the epicure might admire every day in the year. It was this sentiment which he had set to music and sung on this eventful evening under the window of his mistress.

Yu-min-hoo was petrified when he saw his Shangtshee sitting so cosily by the side of a Fan-kwei, which, as I said before, means foreign devil. His indignation was terrible, and his jealousy prodigious. He had thoughts of sitting down by the light of the moon and writing a furious ode, consigning the Fan-kwei to all the Chinese devils, which are the ugliest in the world. Even their gods are monsters, what then must the others be? On second thoughts, however, Yu-min-hoo restrained his muse, and in a moment or two they heard the clatter of his wooden shoes gradually receding. Shangtshee again entreated with her eyes, her hands, nay, her very feet, that Jonathan would make himself scarce. The tears ran down her cheeks, and like torrents of rain wore deep channels in them that almost spoiled their beauty.

Jonathan tried all he could to comfort her, when, what was his surprise and indignation at her base ingratitude, he was saluted with a scratch of those long nails that constitute the most unequivocal claim of a Chinese lady to rank. It was a scratch so emphatic and well-directed, that every nail, and most especially the little finger nail, left its mark on his cheek, and it was preceded and followed by a scream of the highest pretensions.

Our hero was astounded at this salutation. He had heard of love taps, but never of such as these. But he soon understood the whole squinting of the business as slick as a whistle, when he saw little Fat-qua standing before him breathing fire and looking fury with his dark sharp-cornered eyes.

"Hi yah!—Missee Joe Notting—spose think you daughter my one flower-woman—hey?"

Jonathan endeavored to convince Fat-qua that there was not the least harm in sitting by the side of a young woman in a civil way—that it was done in his country every day in the year, particularly on Sundays—and that the women there were quite as good as the Chinese, though they did not wear wooden shoes and nails six inches long.

Fat-qua was wroth at this indecorous comparison of the Fan-kwei ladies with those of the celestial empire; he ordered his servants to seize Jonathan as a violator of Chinese etiquette, and a calumniator of wooden shoes and long nails. He determined in the bitterness of his heart to have him immediately before the worshipful Gan-chat-sze, who would not fail to squeeze some of his dollars out of him.

But further reflection induced him to abandon this course. He recollected, when the fumes of the wine were somewhat dissipated, that both himself and his daughter would be disgraced and dishonored if it were publicly known that she had been in company with a Fan-kwei, a stain of the deepest dye, according to the statutes of the celestial empire, in any but the common women. The only way, therefore, was to make the best of a bad business. Accordingly he bribed his servants to secrecy—married his daughter to the poet—and swore never to invite another Missee Joe Notting to dine with him so long as there was a woman in his house. He had never, he said, met with a fellow of this chop before.

Various were the other adventures of our hero, which are forever incorporated in the annals of the celestial empire, where he figures as the "Great Fan-kwei, Joe Notting." My limits will not suffice to particularize them all, else would I record how he was fined a thousand dollars by his old friend, Gan-chat-sze, for bamboozing a valiant sentinel who refused to let him enter the gates of Canton without a bribe; how his river-horse, being tired of confinement, took an opportunity to jump overboard, whereby he upset a boat and came nigh drowning the passengers. This cost him three thousand dollars more. His next adventure was picking up the body of a drowned man in the river one evening in, passing between his sloop and the shore, whose murder he was found guilty of before Gan-chat-sze, who kindly let him off for ten thousand dollars, advising him at the same time through the hong-merchant Fat-qua, to take the earliest opportunity of making himself invisible within the precincts of the celestial empire.

"I partly guess I'll take his advice, and pull up stakes," said Jonathan. "I never saw such a tarnal place. It beats every thing, I sware. Why, squire Fat-qua, I'll tell you what—if you'll only come to our parts, you may go just where you please—do just as you please—and talk to the gals as much as you please. I'll be choked if it isn't true by the living bokey."

"Hi yah! Missee Joe Notting," replied Fat-qua, "she must be some very fine place dat Merrykey."

"There you are right, squire. But, good bye; I finally conclude it's best to cut stick. They're plaguy slippery fellows here, if they aint, may I be licked by a chap under size."

Jonathan received the remainder of his money, which he was then earnestly advised to invest in bills, and at the same time to sell his vessel, and embark for home in a safer conveyance.

"D'ye think I'm a fellow of no more gumption than that?" said he. "I'll be darned if there's a tighter safer thing than my sloop ever sailed across the salt sea; and as for your paper money, I've had enough of that in my own country in my time."

He declined shipping a crew, for he said he must trust, in that case, to strangers; and he thought to himself that he could easily induce his two cousins to go home with him now he was so rich. It happened as he had anticipated, both gladly rejoined him again, each having failed in his speculation. The Dutchmen at the Cape forbade the one using a machine he had invented for saving labor, lest it might lower the price of their negroes; and the Portuguese and Chinese refused to eat the fish of the other, because he neither crossed himself before the picture of the virgin, nor burnt gilt paper to the image of Neang-ma-ko.

A prosperous voyage ended in Jonathan's happy return to Salem, where he became a great man even to the extent of being yecked honorable. He lived long and happily, and his chief boast to the end of his life was that he had been the first of his countrymen to visit the celestial empire, and the only man that navigated with a Newfoundland dog for an officer.

THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

WE are almost ashamed to say, that after all the "last nights of Cinderella this season," she has come forth again as bewitching as ever. The truth is, this opera offers an entertainment so agreeable and popular, that it can scarcely yet be laid aside without disappointing many. Mr. Barnes has been enacting Romeo, or Juliet, we do not know which, for the thermometer has run up towards ninety; therefore, not being fond of the pathetic, we were not present. By the way, Barnes deserved, and we are told received, a good benefit; but we hope the shade of the poet may scowl upon him in his dreams, for thus burlesquing his fine creations.

The Bowery, in addition to several spectacles of uncommon splendor, which we have noticed before, is coming forth in tragedy with talent. Mr. Booth is a strong attraction, and the Virginian and William Tell of Mr. Hamblin are much and deservedly applauded. We think the policy of the manager will be hereafter to devote his house to tragedy and comedy, while the Park will necessarily stand alone in opera. The two gentlemen named above, with the aid of Mr. Cooper, may afford many attractive exhibitions. The public will doubtless extend to the establishment every encouragement.

At the Chatham, Osvald has been performed. We understand it was entirely successful; but have not had an opportunity of attending its representation, nor of witnessing the efforts of Mr. Adams, by whom it was produced. Mrs. Hughes delivered an epilogue written by Mr. Woodworth. The public will bear in mind that this is the season for benefits, to which the performers, who have so long ministered to our gratification, look for an important part of their reward. However we may be often led into animadversions upon their faults and merits, this is a period when we wish them all success.

EPITAPH ON A HORSE.

Here lies entombed beneath this heap of earth
A gallant horse—whose ancestry or birth,
Though proud, swells not his eulogy: he shone
With genuine worth and virtues all his own.
His generous spirit, that with high disdain
Brook'd not the chiding spur, obey'd the rein:
Meek in his might, though wrong'd, he scorned to deal
Vindictive death-blows from his noble heel;
Sometimes with tame and drooping neck conveyed
The tottering infant, or the trembling maid;
With dumb regard his bounteous master viewed,
And told in looks his honest gratitude.
But when the horn's shrill challenge waked the wood,
With ears erect and quivering limbs he stood;
Forward he flew, the vulgar steeds aloof,
The champagne rung beneath his bounding hoof!
Nor cliffs nor chasins his daring course restrain,
And mountains rise and torrents roar in vain.
Sunk is the arch of that aspiring crest,
The mane's proud streamers and the panting breast;
Mangled and mould'ring in one shapeless heap,
Those flashing eyes and thundering nostrils sleep.
Reader, whoe'er thou art, whose manly mind
Bleeds o'er the ashes of thy mortal kind,
Spare but one drop from pity's generous source,
Nor blush to shed it for my gallant horse.

MUSINGS.

Let the world slip; we shall ne'er be younger. — Shakespeare.

THERE is a singular propensity in human nature to be discontented with the present lot, from anticipations of something better. This disposition of mind, arising from temperament and the influence of a thousand passions, varying with time and circumstances, is more or less exemplified in the character of every individual, no matter how affluent or exalted. Though his fate be cast in pleasant places, overarched with Italian skies, and perfumed with the breezes of Araby; though homage greet him at every turn, and obsequiousness attend his slightest nod; though flattery delight him with her honied praises, and fame tell his glory to every land; though friendship lavish upon him all her endearments, and the charms of affectionate beauty make the sunshine of his dwelling; yea, though hope have redeemed all her promises, and ambition consummated every aim of the past—still he is not satisfied nor at ease in his possessions. If avaricious, with the treasures of Croesus in his coffers, he will still seek to accumulate. If sensual, though nectar and ambrosia crown his table, and a houri minister to his gratifications, he yet longs for other dainties and other untried pleasures. If philosophic, the lore and the written experience of all ages may be his, and still his lamp shall be seen burning at midnight, as he hangs over the crucible, or shapes to the semblance of truth some strange and unheard of theory. In fact, content and competence, for the most part, are not reckoned among the real blessings of to-day, but among those expected to-morrow. "Wait till I have reaped the harvest of another speculation," says the merchant; "wait," laughs the man of the world, "till I have provided a few more of its pleasures;" "wait," cry the soldier, the statesman, the poet, "until we are crowned with more laurels, and then in the buoyancy of gratified wishes we will turn from the turmoil and excitement of ambition to those still, tranquilizing scenes best fitted for the contemplation and sober enjoyments of declining years." But old age finds them plodding on in the same path, as restless, eager, unsatisfied as ever. Now this continued restlessness in the moral world is, I think, in opposition to what nature intended in giving birth to humanity. It is reasonable to suppose that the chief object of our being was happiness, and accordingly, every thing internal or external which tends to make us miserable, must counteract the first design of our existence. Therefore, it is both idle and unphilosophical to indulge this spirit of dissatisfaction with the present, and to yield a blind credulity to the insinuations of fancy with regard to our destiny. These are the great hindrances to contentment, and the sooner we are convinced of it the better. We shall then feel that the true philosophy of life is to let the world slip; and the true knowledge of time, to know that we shall never be younger. Yes, glorious Shakespeare, there is a deep and most excellent wisdom in this thy maxim! Thou knewest that our path is beset with sufficient asperities without our strewing it with thorns of our own rearing. Thou knewest that the allotted period of our earthly sojourn is too short to waste the swift moments of the future in idle regrets for the past. Thou knewest, too, that the present has enough of solace, if not of actual gratification, for any reasonable man in almost every situation, without his annihilating whole years, by endeavoring to forestall in fancy the delights which appertain to them alone. And what right have we, like rude, reckless, and unmannerly urchins, to rush ahead of the grave old gentleman, Time, and plunge ourselves into a thousand dangers and perplexities that might have been avoided had we suffered him to be our pioneer? Though the past is ours no longer, the present is kindly awarded us; and what right have we to be dissatisfied with it, and to seek for flaws and imperfections in a gift as rich as it is unmerited? But the consolations of the present and the blessed inheritance of the past, fraught with the hallowed remembrances of boyhood—its happy innocence, its beauties, its friendships, its artlessness, its exuberance of affection, and buoyancy of soul—all these will not suffice to satiate our inordinate expectations. We must fly to hope for satisfaction, and her land of promise is far among the shadows of the coming eternity. It is there indeed, that forsaking all of time we can call our own, we pass our transitory existence. But this is unwise in the extreme, for if the present has its sufficiency of ills, has it not also its equivalent of blessings? If it has not, then is life in reality a "forced state," and we the veriest playthings and slaves of an untoward destiny. And granting all this, a fine moralist has remarked, "if life is a dream, happy is he who can make most of the illusion." And shall we not believe him? or, in other words, shall we not let the world slip, and manage to slide along with it as smoothly as possible? There is no reason why we should not, and the best why we should—the utter impotency of our individual efforts to alter or retard its course:

"Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum."

It will keep on the same in spite of all utilitarian efforts at reform, so long as the present constitution of things remains. Do all we can—laugh, ridicule, remonstrate, weep as much as we may—the proud will still be haughty, the misanthropic cynical, the melancholy atrabilious, the idle indolent, the vain ostentatious, the gay hilarious, the bigoted fanatic, and the mad, mad. The voice of our chidings would not hush the din of the mighty Babel; and even should it reach the ears of a few, they would listen but to pity or deride. The best we can do therefore is to set a good example before those within the sphere of our influence, for it is not in the power of moralization to change the inwrought texture of human nature. Why not then rest satisfied with our own lot in particular, and with that of the world in general? Why conjure up, like the weeping philosopher, a thousand fancied miseries on which to bestow our tears, while there are so many realities of beauty, of glory, of loveliness, of goodness around us, to call forth smiles of gratitude and admiration? However contemptuous may be our opinion of this world, I believe there are very few of us who, in sober reason, would be willing to exchange it for the uncertainties of another. And as regards our individual lot, should Jupiter permit another collection of the ills of humanity, I do not doubt but each one of us would return with his own bundle of miseries, not having been able to find in the whole heap one for which he was willing to commute it.

The longer I live the more I become convinced that this is not so despicable a world as most people seem inclined to consider it, notwithstanding its changes, its inclemencies, its perturbations, its stern antipoeetical realities, and its bad coffee. It has been grievously misnamed a desert—a dungeon—a vale of tears—a charnel house, and the like; but I think those who christened it were suffering from a distempered fancy, and deserved to be quartered in a lunatic asylum. If it be a desert, it is one not wanting in springs of gladness and sprinklings of living verdure, where the pilgrim may rest for a season from his wanderings, and meet with refreshment and repose. If it be a wilderness, it is one instinct with the spirit of beauty, clothed with magnificence, beaming with the radiance of ten thousand orbs, and hallowed by the endearments of friendship and love. If it be a sepulchre, it is one embosomed in flowers, garnished with the dews of heaven, and the more holy dews of affection and of hope. Look at yonder ocean, now and now shaking with the loud thunderings of its awful commotion the dwellers of every land. Look to the broad dome that overhangs thee, and mark its gorgeous clouds, its rainbows of promise, and its azure abyss filled with the blended effulgence of innumerable burning spheres. Send thy glance abroad over the smiling earth, and feast thy sight with its broad meadows and yellow harvest-fields, its flashing streams and quiet lakes, its blossomed arbors and gothic forests—its round green hills and its abrupt mountains mantled in foliage and standing like giant-billows frozen to stillness by some mighty spell. Go forth among its active multitudes, and listen to the voices of affection, the eloquence of impassioned love, the soothing of sympathy, and the burning words of devotion. Yea, participate in its social enjoyments, its sweet charities, its generous festivities, its household endearments, its boon companionships, and its outpourings of innocent delight.

Do this, poor child of discontent, and then tell me if ours is not a very good world—tell me if happiness, or at least the elements of happiness, are not around us and within our reach. Not a day of our life passes in which we may not enjoy some pleasing phenomenon in external nature, some new perception of moral beauty, some charm of social intercourse, some cheering consciousness of having acted according to the dictates of virtue. Not a day passes in which we may not find some rich gem in the mind's Golconda, or some new fountain of feeling springing up like the geysers of Iceland, warm, pure, and bright, amid even the gloomy and arctic desolation of the most blighted heart. Memory has embalmed many of the fairest flowers which bloomed beside our way, and albeit much of their freshness has faded, she is ever ready to please us with whatever of fragrance and painted loveliness still remains. Fancy waits to charm us with new resemblances and analogies drawn from all objects in the mental and physical worlds, and imagination stands ready to "lap us in the clysium" which rises around us at the wave of her magic wand. Hope presents us with her prism, and as we look through it towards the future, we behold our path overarched with rainbows, and bordered with innumerable forms upon which light has lavished all its tinted glories. Genius has surrounded us with the trophies of his achievements over ignorance and error—unfolded to our apprehension the mysteries of science—and thrown open to us the fairy land of poesy, thronging with scenes more congenial to our feelings than any we meet with even in this fair world, and peopled with bright spirits, to whom our own, in their better aspects, seem intimately allied. Sleep, too, has a paradise of her own, and when darkness has shrouded the outward creation, and weariness stolen from our palsied senses all power of perception, she transports the unslumbering soul to her enchanted domains, where it hears again the sweet voices that long since passed from earth, and sees once more the features of the beloved, whose requiem has long since been chanted, and where visions of prospective happiness are shadowed forth to its enraptured conceptions. Then comes revelation with its holy and sublime promises, giving to those visions the sanction of truth, and to our aspirations for immortality the written assurances of God. What need we more to be contented? to make life slide smoothly and pleasantly along.

Yet with all these blessings, in a world constituted like this, where so many changes are continually occurring, and so many cherished interests are necessarily arrayed against each other, we must calculate on meeting with somewhat of harshness and disappointment. This however should not overcome our equanimity, nor render us gloomy and despondent. It is our own fault if it does. When our sky is overshadowed, the sun is not to blame if the earth sends up her dark exhalations, and shuts out from her bosom the warm effulgence which he freely offers. It is just so with content, the mind's sun, when we suffer the clouds of care, of sorrow, of regret, to obscure the cheering and blessed light which he is always waiting to impart. But on the supposition that our disquietudes are not our own legitimate offspring, does not disappointment on the whole, conduce as much to our happiness as success? Were we always sure of being successful, the pleasures of excitement and of hope would be ours no longer. We should become careless and indolent, and the healthful exhilaration which springs from the uncertainty of our expectations, would degenerate into the morbid listlessness of apathy. And since the delight consequent upon the happy termination of any favorite plan, is in proportion to the obstacles and uncertainties over which we triumph; in like manner, according to the number of our disappointments in life, will be the enhancement of our gratification whenever we are fortunate in our aims. How vain then are our regrets; and how unwise are we, whatever vexation may befall us, not to put on a smiling face, and let the world slide! For myself, I have outlived my teens, and though I am many years on the better side of confirmed old bachelorism, my brow is not unwrinkled, and gray hairs have prematurely intruded among the locks which shade its furrows. Therefore, gentle reader, I feel a sort of natural right to speak to you of myself, and perhaps if you will have the courtesy to listen, you may profit by experience. In my earlier years I was a visionary, in the broadest acceptance of the term. Amid the quiet scenes of a country cottage, I reared air-castles, to which the far-famed masterpieces of Michael Angelo and Sir Christopher Wren are as mole-hills to the towering pyramids, whose shadows span the broad desert which stretches around them. With an imagination teeming with these gorgeous creations, I came to this thronged metropolis an humble but ardent votary of fortune. Young, enthusiastic, inexperienced in the accomplishment of business, without the influence of friends, or the recommendation of a prepossessing exterior, I presented myself to those who, I had the vanity to suppose, might need my services. Long and anxiously did I struggle for even an ordinary situation; but day after day witnessed my disappointment. The fact is, for some reason or other, I did not "take." One laughed at my dress, another at my address; a third censured my boldness, a fourth ridiculed my bashfulness; a fifth objected to my youth, and harshly insinuated, how shocking it was for a boy to run away from his anxious parents; and a sixth, a grave attorney with green spectacles, after assuring me that he did not wish a partner, kindly offered to take my youngest son, as his clerk had just left him! This was too much for mortal equanimity, and rushing from his office with the wildness of lunacy, I slunk back to my obscure lodgings. By the way, it has always been a matter of congratulation with me since, that I did not fall under the inquisitive eye of our worthy high constable during that suspicious retreat. I lit my lamp, and threw myself recklessly into the only chair that graced my cheerless attic. In front of me, on the mantel, lay an odd volume of Shakespeare, and a phial containing a solution of arsenic, which I had been using for the tertian ague—the only acquaintance, by the by, I had as yet contracted since my sojourn in the city. A maniacal smile passed over my hollow and cadaverous cheek, as I eyed the "oblivious antidote," whose sorcery was beguiling me. The spell grew stronger every moment as my mind contrasted its former pleasing prospects with the blank desolation around me; but at length the influence of early precepts, and the instinctive fear of death broke the terrible fascination. With a spasmodic effort I grasped the volume before me, and opening it at random, the first words that caught my attention were those at the head of this article. I read them again and again, and as I pondered over their magic import, a new and animating philosophy was revealed to me. From that moment I resolved to follow as far as possible the counsel of the great expositor of humanity—videlicet, to be an easy, good-natured, light-hearted stoic, in all seasons and circumstances. Since then I have been as happy as Democritus of laughing memory. Few things either disquiet or perplex me; for alike in adversity and in prosperity, I seek to be cheerful and contented. I build as many air-castles now as in the wildest reveries of my brightest days; and when the tyrant, reality, tumbles them down about my ears, I set to work, with a smiling countenance, and rear others in their place more gorgeous and more magnificent than they. I neither court nor shun society, neither flatter nor seek to be flattered. I am polite without servility, independent without obstinacy, gay without boisterousness, jocose but not severe, thoughtful but not sullen, and active without feeling the sting of ambition. I long for neither riches nor honors—I feel myself neither above nor below my fellows—I envy no one but the kindly and noble hearted, hate no one, injure no one voluntarily, and love as many as I can. I have a sigh for honest misfortune, be the sufferer high or low; and a smile for folly or humor under every modification. I hold it not only a right but even a duty, to extract merriment from every legitimate source, whether that source be my own foibles and mistakes, or those of my neighbors; for I consider a good joke one of the excellencies of earth, and a hearty laugh the best specific for a bilious temperament. In fine, I endeavor to use the world as not abusing it, and to keep the golden rule so far as human imperfections will enable me. And now, courteous reader, that you have been initiated into my principles and my practice, what say you? Do you not agree with me, that the true philosophy of life is to "let the world slip," and the true knowledge of time, to know "we shall never be younger?"

DUNS.

"I can get no remedy against this consumption of the purse. Borrowing only lingers and lingers it out, but the disease is incurable."

I HAVE somewhere seen a painting, in which an unhappy-looking half-clothed literary gentleman, in the attic,

"Lulled by soft zephyrs through the broken pane," is enumerating the pleasures of poverty on a very small piece of torn paper, the filling of which appears a contingency not particularly prominent among human probabilities. Among them, however, he has already set down, "no friend asks me to endorse—no sycophants fawning about my person—no tremblings at the cry of fire—no fear during tempests for my ships at sea."

They are, certainly, advantages which must be properly estimated by intelligent persons; yet, notwithstanding these and other whisperings of philosophy, it must be confessed that poverty, to a man of sensitive feelings and fond of good things, is a very disagreeable piece of business.

I do not now allude to any total destitution of means, which implies a want of the absolute necessities of life, but to that awkward, provoking, genteel vagabondism peculiar to cities, which, while it admits of much exterior style, also infers a vast number of one's fellow-citizens who come to see one at all sorts of unseasonable hours, with little pieces of paper in their hands, and go away saying that "they'll have to take their course." I remember it once became necessary for me to spend a day in the office of a friend of mine for the transaction of some business which we could only complete together. He was a fine, high-spirited, liberal fellow. Not vain, but proud as Lucifer, and afflicted with a nervous horror of any thing like parsimony or meanness. At the theatre he would pay for his friends' ticket—and if, after the play, he happened into any of the famous and fashionable places of resort for young men of ton, the oysters and wine were forth-coming as soon as fire could cook and corkscrew extract; and when the sated banqueters had concluded their orgies, and several worthies stepped up to the bar to "pay the shot," as the phrase is, a smile from the waiter, a glance towards my friend, and a brief "all's settled, gentlemen," announced that his usual habit had not been overlooked.

"It's strange," said I to myself, "where all this liberal generosity comes from. He is far from being wealthy, yet he is never in want of cash."

I had not been in his office long when a boy, "begrimed and black," entered the room without any ceremony, and walked up to M.

"Mr. Bangs," said the intruder, in a tone slightly bordering on impertinence, and handing out a piece of paper, "sent up to see if—"

"Oh! ah! yes. I'm glad to see you, my son. Tell your master that I'll call down this afternoon on his business. I think I shall be able to—to—"

"He says," interrupted the boy, "that he's got to make up a sum, and—"

"Very well, very well, my son," said M. hastily, "I'm busy at this moment. I shall certainly call in the afternoon."

"It's more than a year now since you bought the boots," said the boy as he made his exit.

He had scarcely gone, when a woman with back eyes and a sharp nose, entered. Her cheeks were wilted like a dried apple, two of her front teeth were out, her neck was scraggy, and her little thin lips were pursed up together with a palpable effort to suppress some feeling which was boiling within her like hot water in a pot.

Nothing is so lovely as woman in her gentleness and beauty. To rove through forests and gardens with her—to watch the varying color of her cheek when "Witching thoughts, like things half hid,

Lark beneath her silken lashes,
While the modest drop of the veined lid
Oft hides their flashes."

To bend over her as she sings, or lead her through the merry dance; this is very well—and we sigh, and fall into reveries, and write poetry, and look up at the moon, and inquire about the rent of two-story brick houses. But, youthful and romantic reader, rest thee awhile. Years shall pass over thy changing head, and let her break in upon thy solitude with the bitter aspect of a dun, and then hast thou a better homily on the difference between human nature as it seems, and human nature as it is, than thou couldst distil out of a thousand octavos.

My friend fairly started as this new apparition appeared, for he knew well enough that women, "ignorant," as he afterwards expressed it, "of the springs and contingencies of business, are more difficult to deal with in trade than the other sex."

"I've come, Mr. M.," said she, and her voice was slightly tremulous, "I've come, for the last time, for my money—will you pay me or not?"

"My dear madam," said M. "I am very sorry—I am not in funds at this particular moment. It's very unlucky, and—"

"But will you give me my money?" she interrupted in an elevated, sharp tone; making the four last words awfully emphatic by letting the back of her extended hand fall rather forcibly on the table as she pronounced each one.

"Madam," said my friend, if I have no money, I cannot give you any. If I had I would. To-morrow—"

"So you've said these six weeks, Mr. M., and I'll endure it no longer. I'm a poor, defenceless widow, with eleven children, and I'm going to be turned out of my house because I can't pay my rent, and because you and your friend wish to cheat me out of my pay."

"When I went security for my friend," said M. "I had no idea either that he was going to die, or that I could not pay the debt at any moment; but so it is, and I must say, madam, that if my own sense of honor is not sufficient to make me perform impossibilities, your impertinence will not be more successful."

"Oh, very well, sir, very well, sir. Sense of honor, indeed—cheat a poor woman out of twenty dollars, and then talk of 'sense of honor.' I'll send old Hays after you, and see what he'll say to your 'sense of honor.'" And she bounced out of the room in a most especial passion.

M. bit his lip and swallowed the insult as well as he could. We had made but little progress in our occupation before a third, in the shape of an old gentleman, opened the door slowly and—

But why proceed further with the recapitulation of my friend's grievances? I have already described enough to convince the reader that he must lead a dog's life of it.

It is too common for people to look with an evil eye upon these unfortunates, who by the vicissitudes of the world and the customs of society, have found their fellow-creatures possessed of claims against them extremely irksome, and sometimes impossible to be discharged. Now with due deference to these harsh observers I hold the opposite opinion. They are often the best of good fellows—are betrayed into their difficulties by the excellence of their hearts and an absence of that close, calculating, bargain-driving, penny-saving spirit which is seldom associated with any thing generous or noble. Perhaps a person thus in the power of duns is the most complete slave in the world. For while he has not had sufficient prudence to keep out of debt, he cannot help being heartily ashamed of it. The more intelligent, good-hearted and gentlemanly he is, the more acutely he will feel the ten thousand stinging and prostrating mortifications to which he is continually exposed. While his tormentors, mistaking his ingenuous embarrassment and patient endurance of their importunities for obsequiousness, press upon him with ten-fold rudeness, and take all opportunities to insult him. By the very urgency of their entreaties they extort promises, which he makes in the anxiety of the moment, forgetting that a compliance with them will be out of his power, till at length the poor debtor is sunk in the esteem of all the world as well as in his own. If he chance to be of a sensitive disposition these circumstances may prey upon his spirits, and either break his heart or give him the dyspepsia; but should he be blessed with an elastic mind, he may hit upon various methods of eluding their vigilance; and I once heard a gentlemanly fellow who, like Jaffier, was not "worth a ducat," expatiate upon the epicurean luxury which he had enjoyed from a third-story window on looking down on the head and shoulders of a disappointed dun, who was walking slowly away from the door, having been just informed that he was not at home. LITERARY NOTICES.

The American Quarterly Review. No. xviii. June, 1831. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. New-York: G. & C. & H. Carvill.

THE present number of this work is marked by its usual sound, practical sense, and vigorous style of writing. We have already published the table of contents. The review of the history of Poland will be perused at this time with peculiar interest and advantage. The article on the Siamese Twins contains several observations obviously applicable to our literature. It would be an amusing task for one of sufficient leisure, to look through books published during the last twelve months, to collect the criticisms, i. e. puffs, from the periodical prints upon the same, and compare these inflated and audacious hyperboles with the truth. We subjoin an extract from the remarks of Mr. Walsh:

"We should think, indeed, that experience had by this time taught the world the little reliance which ought to be placed generally on contemporary criticism, particularly that description of it usually found in newspapers. But the wide diffusion of this species of periodical work gives them an influence which no experience, however palpable, of their erroneous judgments in literary matters, has yet been able to counteract. The public, in truth, has hitherto had its attention but little drawn towards this subject. The fate of a new book seems to be a matter so uninteresting to any but the author and the publisher, that whether editors speak of it favorably or unfavorably, or pass over it with entire neglect, is considered of no importance. It is forgotten that good literature forms the chief and most permanent glory of a country; that its prosperity is, therefore, of much national value, and ought, for the public benefit, to be assiduously promoted. But the chance of good literature being properly encouraged, will be ever extremely small, so long as worthless productions are forced into even temporary eclat by those ready and often glowing commendations of careless editors, which must always, more or less, give direction to public patronage.

"There is an erroneous opinion, unfortunately too prevalent among all classes, that no book can become generally noticed and much praised in the periodical works, but in consequence of its merit. To those who hold this opinion, the system of reverberating praise from one journal to another, must be unknown. In this country the system is, at present, carried to a great extent. It is chiefly produced by indolence or want of leisure, preventing our editors from carefully reading and judging for themselves, aided by a desire which actuates many of them to be thought fashionable in their opinions. The literary idol of the day is generally set up in the English metropolis. Of course, the fashion of worshipping him commences there. We soon hear of him on this side of the ocean. We wait not to examine whether he be entitled to homage. We take that for granted, since we are told that he is considered so in London. With slavish obsequiousness, we hasten to follow the capricious example of the great metropolis, and shout paeans for the fashionable idol, with as much zeal as if we really discerned in his works merit sufficiently exalted to entitle him to such applause, although the probability is, that, while we are bestowing it, we have scarcely glanced over his productions.

"Now all this is, on our part, exceedingly ridiculous and irrational. It not only exposes our servility, but it betrays our ignorance of many of the temporary excitements in favor of certain authors and their works which take place in London. It shows that we are not aware of the fact, that, in the majority of cases, the rage for a new foreign book is owing to circumstances not at all connected with its merit. An influential and enterprising publisher—a striking or a popular subject—a sounding title—a bold, a wealthy, or an eccentric author—and, above all, a continued series of well-managed puffs, invariably do much more towards making a book fashionable than any excellence it may possess; and the inducement to purchase it is more frequently the knowledge that it is fashionable abroad, than the conviction that it is good. Hence, it is to their title-pages, rather than to their nature or quality, that new books are mostly indebted for their immediate success. Their permanent success—that is, their enduring fame—is another matter. Merit, and merit only, can secure that; for it is the result of the cool and deliberate approbation which is awarded by the judgment of mankind, when the adventitious circumstances which first excited attention towards the book have passed away and can operate no longer on curiosity. The history of literature amply proves this. Books have often had, for a time, great mercantile value, and been highly profitable to the booksellers, that have been utterly worthless in a literary point of view. Of this fact the book-dealers are so well aware, that, rather than risk the expense of publishing the most beautiful composition of an unknown author, they will pay largely for manuscripts of the merest trash from the pen of one to whom some lucky accident has already drawn public attention. Many of our well-meaning echoes of the London puffs of new books, are certainly ignorant of this circumstance, or they would not lend their aid to give circulation and temporary repute to much of the vile literature which, under the names of novels, poems, travels, &c. the press of London has so largely poured forth during the last eight or ten years, to the great deterioration not only of the literary taste, but of the manners and morals of the age.

"It is indeed a sad mistake to suppose that nothing but the literary excellence of a new book renders it saleable. Yet it is a mistake so very general, that the booksellers find that the most effectual mode of recommending a new work is to allege that it sells rapidly. Who does not know, when a book with the reputation of being in great demand, comes amongst us, the eagerness with which it is sought after? No matter how dull it may be, while it is considered saleable, it is perused with delight. A thousand beauties are discovered in it, which cool and unprepossessed judgment could never discern; and as to faults, although they should stare the deluded reader in the face as thickly and visibly as trees in a forest, he will doubt the accuracy of his own sensations, rather than admit that he perceives them."

We subscribe to the truth of the foregoing with this only comment, that, although a correct opinion cannot always be formed of a book from the eulogies it elicits, we think there can be no better evidence of its excellence than that it sells. This is amply illustrated by melancholy heaps of overpriced volumes yet remaining on the shelves of the unfortunate

The Dutchman's Fireside, a Tale; by the Author of "Letters from the South; The Backwoodsman; John Bull in America, &c. &c. Second edition. New-York: J. & J. Harper, 1831. 2 vols. 12mo. (Second Notice.)

We have received additional gratification from the second perusal of this delightful book, and read it just as we wander through a wood, finding something new, agreeable, and natural, at every step. It contains a fine mixture of active incident, rich description, and philosophical thought; and illustrates, with great skill, and a most pleasing air of quietness and simplicity, the peculiarities and gradual development of a noble but sensitive disposition, and also the early manners and customs of the country. We admire it for its manly and healthy tone of Americanism, in which our native writers are lamentably deficient; for its absolute freedom from affectation, and for the powerful interest which is excited in the mind of the reader, without violating the probability of the time and place, or wandering away from the routine of common life. The author evidently writes from nature and his own observation, and in that style wherein the humorous saddens into the sentimental and pathetic, and takes the feelings by surprise. The sketches of landscape, the portraiture of character, and the remarks which profusely sprinkle them over, or connect them together, are bold, graphic, distinct and picturesque. The beauty of the plot is its simplicity. The incidents are such as every one feels might have happened to himself, and the characters similar to those met with in our daily traffic with the world, where faults and virtues are alternately predominant over each other. In person, they are neither Venuses nor Apollos. The heroine, Catalina, will be recognised and loved by all; and Sybrandt, the hero, flourishes in a ball room with "snuff-colored breeches." If any finish the perusal of these volumes without being sometimes betrayed into a hearty laugh, and, at others, "albeit unused to the melting mood," abandoning themselves to the influence of the more serious portions of the story, it will be such as are offended by the shafts which the author frequently lances against foreign opinions, and the pretensions of aristocracy. The abuse of such will afford the most satisfactory evidence that his arrows have hit the mark. We perceive, with great pleasure, the unanimity of approbation with which this production has been noticed by the public press, and among innumerable others, we quote the following:

"There is no man," says the editor of the Standard, "who makes the least pretensions of tracing his genealogy to the days of Peter Stuyvesant or Wouter Van Twiller, who will not think our author worthy of being painted in a cocked hat and corduroy indispensible."

"To those," observes another intelligent cotemporary, "if such there be among our readers, to whom the author's vein is not familiar, we offer the opinion of a very competent critic, who, years since, spoke of him as

"One whose giant powers,
Seen in their native element, would be
Known to a future age, the pride of ours.—
There is none breathing who can better wield
The battle-axe of satire."

But we must return to the volume itself. There is practical good sense in the following observations:

"Assuredly learning is a thing of most inestimable value; but still I doubt it may be bought too dearly. Why should the season of childhood, which God and nature have ordained to be a period of freedom from cares and toils, be converted into one of labor and anxiety, for the sake of a little premature knowledge, which the early and tender intellect is unable to comprehend, or the comprehension of which requires an effort of the mind which stunts its growth forever afterwards? Knowledge should only keep pace with the natural growth of the human faculties. If it comes to exceed the powers of the mind, and be too great for the grasp of our reason and judgment, the overburdened intellect becomes but an ass, laden with treasures of no use to the bearer, and only calculated to oppress the wholesome vigor and vivacity of nature. When I see a little urchin, who ought to be enjoying nature's holiday, and strengthening his constitution by wholesome exercise to bear the vicissitudes of the world in after-times, kidnapped and sent to school, to sit on a bench for four or five hours together, employed in learning by rote what he is unable to comprehend, I cannot help contemplating him as the slave and the victim of the vanity of the parent and the folly of the teacher. Such a system is only calculated to lay a foundation for disease and decrepitude, to stunt the physical and intellectual growth, and to produce a premature old age of body and mind."

And again:

"Undoubtedly simplicity of manners is one of the great pillars of morality. It diminishes our wants, and thus diminishes those tempting temptations to extravagance and dishonesty which originate in, and receive their power from, the love of dress, splendor, display, and luxury. Those who set an inordinate value upon the qualification of these vanities will come in time to sacrifice to their attainment all that solid stock of happiness which is derived from the possession of integrity and independence. An age of simplicity is therefore an age of morality; and hence it is that the wisest writers of antiquity have made simplicity of manners essential to the preservation of that liberty which cannot be sustained by a luxurious and corrupt people. That our own high feelings of independence are rapidly fleeing away before the quick steps of ostentation and luxury, and that the love of wealth, as the means of attaining to these gratifications, is becoming the ruling passion, must be obvious to all observers. But enough of this; the subject belongs to graver heads than ours."

An insight into the character of the hero may be obtained from the following:

"Reader, art thou a modest, bashful, or what is still more, a sheepish young person, as proud as Lucifer, and with feelings more wakeful and skittish than a wild partridge? and hast thou ever been made the object of laughter? If so, thou wilt be able to enter into the agonies of Sybrandt, as he stood perspiring under the consciousness that he cut rather a ridiculous figure. No one can ever know what a man suffers in such a situation, except persons of the temperament I have described. If they did—if they could enter into the recesses of their hearts, and see the strings quivering with keen and bitter mortifications, the most ill-natured, malignant being that was ever created would be careful not to play rudely upon an instrument so easily disposed to tormenting discords. There are thousands of young persons, and all of the higher order of intellect, who, in the days of their probation, before their hearts are seared in the fires of indulgence, or deadened by disappointments, suffer more from the careless disregard to their feelings, and the thoughtless ridicule indulged in by the domestic circle in which they move, than from all other causes combined.

"When they came to the river-side, where lay the little boat which was to take them to the island, Sybrandt had sworn to himself that he would offer his hand to Catalina, to assist her in embarking. But he was so long before he could screw himself up to the direful feat, that one of the Albany lads, more gallant as well as alert, was beforehand with him. A bashful man is like a tiger; he makes but one effort, and if that fails, slinks away to his jungle, and essays not another. I myself have my own experience to vouch for this; having in the far-off days of my gallantry, full many a time and oft, in dining out, gathered myself together with a gallant ferocity to ask the lady of the feast for the honor of a glass of wine with her. But alas! if peradventure the lady listened not to my first demonstration, I was prone to relapse into an utter and incurable incapacity to repeat the mighty effort. The sound of my voice died suddenly, and word spoke I never more. So was it with master Sybrandt, who, having expended his powder in a flash of the pan, sunk only the lower for the exertion he had made. * * * * Indeed there is not in the world so impudent a being as a shy man forced out of his shyness. * * * * By degrees the feelings which nature had implanted in his heart opened and expanded, like the seeds which lie dormant in the deep shades of the forest for years, until the trees being cut down, the warm sunbeams waken them to life and vegetation. The emotions of his heart for a while overpowered his long-cherished timidity, and lent to his tongue an eloquence that pleased, while it surprised Catalina. The rich stores of imagery which long reading and contemplation had gathered in his mind, where they had lain enchained in the icy fetters of timidity, were let loose by the new-born warmth that thrilled through his frame, and flowed forth without study or effort into striking observations, tender associations, and sparkles of a rich and glowing fancy. Catalina listened with astonishment to the animated statue; and as she looked him in the face while pouring forth the treasures of his mind, and saw the divinity that sparkled in his eyes, she once or twice detected herself in thinking Sybrandt almost as handsome as an aid-de-camp. He, too, felt elevated in his own estimation; for the first time in his life he had listened to his own voice without feeling his heart beat with apprehension, and for the first time he could look back upon an hour spent in the society of a female, without a pang of the keenest mortification.

"Sybrandt," at length said Catalina, "why don't you talk so every day?"

"Because every day is not like to-day; not any more, my cousin, always what you are now."

There is much drollery in the character of plexity under the visitation of the bees is laughable, and so also is his conduct during the tempest, when he was "as busy as an assistant alderman at a fire, and about as useful."

The sketch of Hans Pipe, the Indian reprobate, is drawn with the rapid boldness of a master.

"So it happened with Hans Pipe. He became a drunkard and a vagabond; and was finally turned away from Colonel Vancour's house, for having drawn his knife upon one of the black children, who refused to bring him another mug of cider. He was too lazy to work except at trifling jobs, for which he asked nothing but liquor, and to which nothing but liquor could incite him. His days were spent in drunkenness and beastly exhibitions of savage indecencies, and his nights consumed in prowling about thieving, or in barns or outhouses, sleeping away the effects of his daily debauch. Sometimes, but very rarely, he would come to the mansion-house, when he was sober, and beg for food or clothing, which was never refused him. Perhaps a more worthless, dangerous and revengeful being never crawled upon the earth, than this wretched outcast of the savage and civilized world. His appearance was horrible and appalling. Long, lank, raven hair hung about his shoulders, and almost covered his low forehead; his high cheek-bones, flattened nose, wide nostrils, and still wider mouth, together with his miserable garments and dirty habits, made the heart shudder to look upon him. But it was his eye—his bitter, malignant, bloodshot eye, circled with the flaming ring of habitual intemperance, within which rolled the ball of fire, that gave the most unequivocal indications of the fiend which kept the citadel of his heart. It discoursed of murder, open or secret, at midnight or mid-day; of a vengeance which a moment might light up, and years would not extinguish; of secret plots and open daring."

We admire the naïveté with which, in the third chapter of the second volume, Sir Thicknesse Throgmorton and the Honorable Barry Gilfillan are introduced upon the stage, both of whom are capital likenesses. Take as a specimen the subjoined outline of the former gentleman, whose pride and clumsiness are no uncommon peculiarities, and whose "bow was an outrage both on nature and inclination."

"Independently of the infringement upon his personal, hereditary, and official dignity manifested by an abrupt address from an inferior, Sir Thicknesse had another special cause for disliking to be spoken to by strangers. The fact is, he was so long in collecting the materials of an answer to the most common observation, that he seldom forgave a person for putting him to the trouble. He had a most rare and, at that time, original style of making the agreeable, which is now, however, pretty general among high-bred persons. He placed himself directly opposite the lady, straddling like a gigantic pair of brass tongs, to collect his ideas into one great explosion—such, for instance, as 'Don't you find it rather warm, mawm?' Perfectly satisfied with this mighty effort, the knight would strut off in triumph, to repose himself for the rest of the evening under the shade of his laurels."

We should be pleased to insert the battle in the wood, the death and burial of the gallant Gilfillan, and the admirably finished character of Sir William Johnson, but a desire not to forestall the pleasure of the reader compels us to forbear. We therefore conclude our extracts with the following, which, with much forcible description, contains some merited strokes of satire laid on with right good will.

"The good Dennis—the early friend, the father of our hero in all acts of fatherly affection—who had smoked his pipe almost threescore years in quiet in the same old arm-chair—heard the news of Sybrandt's death without any outward symptoms of sorrow or despair. He possessed no great store of sensibility, but a slight shock will shake down an old building. He knocked the ashes out of his pipe deliberately against his thumb-nail, and that evening, and the next, and the next morning, noon, and night, when it was brought to him he put it aside without uttering a word.

"'Massa in a bad way,' said his old dusky valet, who had been his playmate in youth, his faithful, humble friend through life; 'massa in a terrible bad way when he no smoke he pipe.'

"The old man reasoned philosophically, or at least he came to the right conclusion, which the vulgar generally do by a sort of short-hand cut of their own. It is astonishing, as it is mortifying to the pride of human learning, to see how many, how very many of the discoveries of philosophers have been anticipated by the experience of the unlearned of this world. They may not, perhaps, know the reason, but they know the thing is so, and this answers their purpose quite as well.

"The old natural philosopher was right. There is no surer indication of a wounded spirit or diseased body than the disrelish of a long-cherished habit. It smells of mortality. The quiet resignation with which the good Dennis received the first shock, gave place in a day or two to a degree of restlessness and impatience entirely at war with his usual deportment. It seemed as if his mind was disturbed by conflicting feelings of some kind or other, for he frequently shut himself up in his little private room where he kept his papers, and where he was sometimes found when called to his meals, leaning on his elbows on a table with papers before him. When thus disturbed, he would appear rather pleased than otherwise, as though he had been relieved from some unpleasant struggle or uncertainty. On the fourth day after receiving the news of Sybrandt's death, he was found sitting in his arm-chair, dead. He had died without pain, for his face had all the placid quiet of a sweet sleep, and he sat upright as when alive.

"'Ah! poor massa!' exclaimed the old man of color; 'he smoke him last pipe now!' and nature squeezed some honest tears from his dry and withered sympathies.

"Dennis Vancour was a good man. He never—for it was not the fashion at that time—he never was secretary, or, what is still better, treasurer to a society for expending the hard gains of honest industry in the encouragement of idleness and unthrift. He never went about begging of others what he was able to bestow himself; nor did he spend his time in the mischievous occupation of doing good to his fellow-creatures, the poor, by teaching them as the wise and benevolent Franklin has it, 'that there are other means of support besides industry and economy.'

"But these sins of omission were more than balanced by rare and valuable virtues. He never belied, or cheated, or overreached a human being; he never denied his good offices or good report to the deserving, nor inquired before he bestowed them, whether they were given to a member of his favorite society or his favorite religion. He walked quietly on his way without jostling a living soul with his elbow, or interfering with his concerns unless desired to do so; and within the circle where alone ordinary men can be useful in their exertions or their beneficence—the circle of his friends and neighbors—he diffused all his life a benign yet temperate influence, which caused every one that knew him to love him while living, and cherish his memory after he was gone. When he died, he left what he had received from his father to his nearest natural heirs; nor did he insult heaven by robbing his kindred to commute for his own transgressions.

"The day but one after the decease of the good man, on whose memory I confess I delight to dwell, the bell of the little octagon stone church at the Flats gave melancholy warning that the body of some heir of immortality was about to be consigned to that narrow house wherein no air can blow. There is to my mind and to my early recollections something exquisitely touching in the tolling of a church-bell amid the silence of the country. It communicates for miles around the message of mortality. The ploughman stops his horses to listen to the solemn tidings; the housewife remits her domestic occupations, and sits with the needle idle in her fingers, to ponder who it is that is going to the long home; and even the little thoughtless children, playing and laughing their way from school, are arrested for a moment in their evening gambols by these sounds of melancholy import, and cover their heads when they go to rest.

"In a little while was seen a long procession of various rustic carriages, followed by people on foot and on horseback, of both sexes, and of all ages, slowly emerging from the court of the house whence the soul of the good man had ascended to its reward, and proceeding to the place appointed for all living. The simple ceremony was soon over. A prayer was uttered, a hymn was sung, many an honest tear mixed with the earth thrown into the grave, as the nearest and dearest hung anxiously over it; and the remains of Dennis reposed in peace between the grave-stones of his honored parents.

"HE WAS A GOOD MAN," said an old patriarch of almost a hundred years, and the testimony was vouched by the hearts of all present. Does any one wish a nobler epitaph? If he does, let him go and take his choice of the legends engraven on the mouldering monuments of human vanity—no part of which is true, perchance, but the veritable Hic jacet."

Notwithstanding the excellence of this work, it might have been greatly improved by a few hours of additional revision. Words occasionally find their way as if by accident where they have no business. It argues a kind of unpardonable negligence on the part of an author who ventures thus into the presence of the public with marks of carelessness in his apparel. He resembles a gentleman entering a fashionable drawing-room without having fully completed his toilette. A little more labor might have rendered it as finished as it is interesting. Although these are merely errors of style, they are to be regretted, inasmuch as such productions form models for young writers. We may, however, quote the words of Campbell's New Monthly Magazine, in relation to Mr. Paulding: "He goes forth upon his way manfully, like a strong traveller, more determined to reach the end of his journey than solicitous concerning the grace of his demeanor." Besides this, we can advance no more serious regrets against our author than that his antediluvian hatred of railroads should be accompanied by an incredulity touching the sea-serpent, which smacks strongly of the general skepticism of this enlightened age.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Chains.—No people boast more than Americans. This is less unpardonable, as in truth no people possess more advantages of which to be proud. When, however, any practice prevails here, diametrically opposite to right, to reason, and to law, it shows more glaringly conspicuous, and turns our self-congratulations into the sharpest satire. There are certain manners, customs, and acts of legislature, which really seem entailed upon us by necessity, and are, as Sir Francis Rochdale observes to the brazier in John Bull, "like a hunch back, and must be, therefore, got along with as well as possible." There are others for which the same apology does not exist. What would the reader say, should the door open even while he peruses these lines, and a brace of constables rush in upon him—convey him to prison, place iron chains upon his wrists, and carry him, thus manacled like a slave, before the tribunal of his country? He may be innocent—he may be guilty—whether he is one or the other can only be determined by a trial, until the termination of which it is the merciful maxim of the law, that he shall be deemed innocent. There is something in the idea of chains so closely interwoven with the dark associations of the old world, with the power of the despot, the malignity of the inquisition, with every thing from which the manly spirit recoils, and at which the honest indignation of a free citizen boils in his veins, that, at first view perhaps, many will deem it impossible that a friendless man—be he good or bad—before any means have been adopted to ascertain his criminality, may be marched through the streets of this city with fetters clanking about his limbs. Neither is this piece of oppression practised merely upon old and oft-convicted offenders—upon prisoners guilty of violence to their keepers—or who have shown a design to escape—nor even upon persons accused of crimes implying felony, murder, theft, &c.; but upon those who have been charged with assault and battery, into which the most honest and virtuous and proud may sometimes be betrayed. We invite the attention of the proper authorities to this subject. If the safety of the accused is deemed not sufficiently guarded, let the officers be doubled; let ten times the number be employed, rather than the rattling of chains on an unconvicted citizen should disgrace our courts of justice. If a man, knowing himself to be innocent of the charge alleged against him, should refuse to put his hands in irons—if he should strike down, and so that he could not arise in haste, him who approached to enforce so illegal and atrocious an insult, who would sit on the jury to condemn him? These little inadvertencies which escape the notice of our citizens, are observed and remembered by foreigners, and serve to eke out future octavos, while our own writers contradict them because they are ignorant of the truth.

Exchange papers.—Our list of exchange papers has increased to such a number, that necessity compels us to make numerous erasures. For this step our heavy expenses, and the little use we make of the majority of these publications, must be an apology. It is done without any unkind feeling, for we would willingly oblige all if possible, without too great a sacrifice. Those, therefore, who do not receive this journal after the close of the present year, will understand the reason. We are, however, so greatly indebted to many editorial friends, especially to those who have published the prospectus of the forthcoming volume, that we shall always be happy to continue the exchange with them.

Business habits.—An English paper states that nine hundred letters have been put in the London post-office during the last year, without any superscription, which contained ten thousand pounds sterling. Twelve thousand pounds were found loose in the letter bags, from the carelessness of the encloser. Either the circulating medium must be abundant on the other side of the water, or our friends there require much instruction in business matters.

Prospectus and Agents.—A list of agents, and a prospectus for the ninth volume, will be found on the first page of the cover, to which the reader is respectfully referred.

OH! SAY NOT YOU REGRET.

A BALLAD—THE WORDS BY N. G.—THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY T. COMER.

We feel pleasure in being able to embellish the present number of the Mirror with the following delicate and pretty melody. The name of the author of the words we are not at liberty to mention, but he is well known among the litterati of Boston as a ready and graceful writer. Mr. COMER is a composer of established reputation, which will not be diminished by this specimen of his taste and skill. Although a few copies were struck off for private circulation, it has never before been given to the public, and possesses, therefore, all the freshness of originality. It was once sung at a concert, and universally admired. The correspondent who so politely furnished us with the copy, has our thanks for his attention.

Larghetto espressivo.

Espressivo.

2d verse.

SECOND VERSE.

Why did you tempt my love—
Why trifle with a heart
Which you alone had pow'r to move—
If thus we are to part?
Then, lady, let me hope
The calm and silent bliss
Of being near thee once again,
In some such hour as this.

THIRD VERSE.

And in that hope I'll live,
And bless and pray for thee—
For nothing this fair earth can give
Is half so dear to me,
As was one look of thine,
Confiding, kind, and true,
When it return'd a glance of mine,
And thrill'd my pulses through.

STYLE.—Great learning and acquirements do not always produce a good style in writing. Some of the most learned men that ever lived wrote indifferently.

POETRY.—Julius Scaliger says, "no one ever was a poet, or a lover of poetry, that was not an honest man." This definition would strike off a great many names from the roll of Parnassus, and greatly reduce the number of their readers.

AGE AND YOUTH.—Old men, who get angry at the vivacity and sportiveness of youth, might as well find fault with the spring because it produces nothing but blossoms; or expect the fruit of autumn at that early season.

TAVERNS.—A witty moralist used to say that taverns were places where they sold madness, disease, and ruin by the bottle.

ARISTOTLE.—Some one has given the following noble character of the genius of Aristotle: "he was the secretary of nature; he dipt his pen in intellect."

POPE SIXTUS THE FIFTH.—This pope was one of the most illustrious pontiffs that ever occupied the papal throne. He was liberal, inflexible, persevering and magnanimous. He was originally a swineherd.

A RETROSPECT.

Chaque flot m'apporte une image ;
Chaque rocher de ton rivage
Me fait souvenir ou rêver — La Martine.

How pure and softly sweet the heart-felt tone
Of some old half-forgotten melody,
Which steals at midnight's calm and witching hour
On the fond dreamer's ear! thus beautiful
Are the bright fancies clustered round that chain
Of dim-discovered lights in memory's waste,
Which, stretching through the vista of past years,
Is lost in infancy's uncertain haze.

I am a dreamer,—what the world calls idle—
And I do love to "chew the cud of sweet"
It may be "bitter fancy"—I ne'er knew
A fresh-plucked joy which was not doubly dear
When touched and mellowed by the lapse of time,—
And hence it is, remembered happiness
Throws o'er my mind a soft illusive spell,—
A charm which flush enjoyment never gave!

And I have garnered up a treasured fund
Of hallowed recollections—and of oft-times
I love to sit at twilight's placid hour,
And by the "pale reflex" of memory's light,
Trace out the shadows of the dreamy past!
Among the cherished scenes on which my thoughts
Delight to linger, there is one whose charms
Sometimes flit by me in more sober hours,
Than those which fancy claims—and I have dreamed
That when the pomp and bustle of the world
Have all their sunshine and their music lost,
I'd seek the silence of those quiet glades
To pass the peaceful evening of my life.

It is a lake, whose calm unruffled waves
Rest in the bosom of surrounding hills,
Unvisited by storms! the wintry blast
In sullen pride sweeps by—but the light air—
The balmy breath of summer eddying o'er
The hill-tops, wafts its fragrance, mingled with
The gush of waters and the song of birds,
And to excited senses it would seem
The spirit of the mountains stooping down
To kiss the sleeping lake that lieth there,
And mould each tiny ripple into forms
Of magic beauty—Oft I sought that spot,
When freed from learning's dull formalities,
To wile away the lame and tedious hours,
And dream of my far home—there's scarce a tree,
Or shrub, or modest flower, that blossomed there,
Which is not linked to memory for ever,
Hallowed by many a bright imagining!
And there were some who shared my pastime then,
The loved companions of my earlier days,—
And 'twas our joy to revel in the shade
Of the cool pines; and, at the evening hour,
Urge our swift pinnace o'er the dancing waves.
Now are we changed—but can we ever forget
Those bright days with their pleasant faded dreams?
And there were snatches of quaint songs, on which
Youth and light-heartedness bestowed a grace,
Which otherwise they had not—there was one
Which I have not forgotten—thus it ran:

SONG.

O'er thy calm bosom, silver lake
Our fairy bark securely glides—
There's scarce a breath thy rest to break,
Or stir the flow'rets on thy sides.

Then gently, softly, comrades, row—
Break not the holy spell,
We ne'er will find on earth below
A scene we'll love so well!

The bright isles of the western sky
Are mirrored in this magic sea—
So hope reflects the glowing dye
Of many a promised joy to me.

Then gently dip the bearded oar
Brush no the waves too near—
On life's dark sea we'll view no more
The visions pictured here!

The evening star is glittering now
Above yon mountain gray—
Let thoughts of home light up each brow,
The memory's festal day.

Then, gently row: the world cannot Give back such dreams again—
These holier feelings, soon forgot,
Will turn to care and pain!

The soft moonlight is gilding too
The ripple's brightened crest,
Like bliss it sparkles into view,
Then darkly sinks to rest.

Then gently, softly, comrades, row—
Break no the happy spell,
We ne'er will find on earth below
A scene we'll love so well.

ORIGINAL TALES.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HASTINGS.

NEAR Hastings, a sea-port in the county of Sussex, England, stood in the year 1803, a cottage noted for its beauty and retirement. To this delightful spot it was customary for the visitors of that fashionable watering-place, to ride in the early morning, or towards the approach of evening, when the heat of the summer sun, reflected with greater power by the sandy soil and towering rocks by which the town is surrounded, gives place to the coolness and shadow most favorable to gentle exercises.

My readers I have no doubt will call to mind, that this scene is celebrated for the memorable and bloody battle which in history bears its name. In the days of William the Conqueror, however, Hastings was no more than a mere fishing-place; and it is but of late years that it has become one of fashion. About eight miles from the town is a village called Battle, and here it was that the great struggle between the English and the Norman invaders actually took place. It of course derived its name from that event. Here is an abbey as ancient perhaps as any in that part of the kingdom; and though so old, it is still in most excellent order. It is not a building of any great extent: beauty and simplicity being its chief attractions. The front presents on each side an octangular lofty tower, between which expands its entrance in the form of a high gothic archway. Within this are seen two ponderous oaken doors of giant make, studded with iron bolts and bars, sufficiently strong to have resisted the stroke of the stoutest warrior the proud invader could produce. They swing on huge hinges that stretch their lengthened grasp across the doors, and lead you directly into a large chapel, much out of repair from disuse and neglect. Between the towers is situated the belfry, and above that a flag-staff, which even now upon certain feast-days displays its ancient pennon. The grounds which surround it are remarkable only for groups of immense and venerable elms, which fling their deep shadows far round, and completely envelop the abbey. In the cemetery a few tomb-stones are scattered here and there, bearing the defaced and almost illegible eulogies of its peaceful inhabitants; but it is the hand of time, not of mischief or disrespect, that has left his mark upon these weather-beaten emblems, not only of the vanity of life but of fame. The main path to the abbey is in front, between a double row of elms on either side, combining at the top, and forming a magnificent arched avenue. Other paths lead to and from the abbey, through the dense woods, and to the private cells and cloisters, which were so useful for the startling practices of the monks. The country between Battle and Hastings is remarkably hilly, though highly cultivated, and boasts of the most elevated land to be seen along that part of the coast. This point or pinnacle is called Fair Light, from the two-fold circumstance of its being so far above its neighboring hills, and bearing on its summit a beautiful revolving light. Fair Light is rather more than half way from Battle to Hastings, and stands aside, at least a mile, from the public road.

I spent several weeks wandering among these delightful hills, interesting as the spot fixed upon by the Normans for invasion. It was during one of my evening rambles to Fair Light, when, the beauties of the surrounding view inducing a poetic mood, my mind framed, without much effort, the following lines:

Leaps not thy heart for joy that long has pined
In fogs and city fumes, when the blue sea
Bursts on thy sight, brushed by the wanton wind,
And wholesome Hastings opens her stores for thee?
See, where her barks upon the sparkling waves,
Turn their white wings, and range for sport or prey,
Till the loud storm rides furious o'er the bay,
And flings them to the strand, and idly raves
Against yon furrowed cliff, whose towers among
Where first old conquest raised her Norman throne,
With troubled scream, the flickering sea-birds throng.
But now 'tis calm, and day's bright orb is gone,
Mount we yon moss-grown hill, while o'er our head
And the hush'd deep, night's glit'ring dome is spread.

Near the lighthouse was a mill of very ancient structure, and well known to the far surrounding dwellers of the land as the property of honest farmer Allworthy. The path to Hastings wound round the bases of the steep and almost perpendicular hills that lie between the two places. No one can gaze upon this beautiful and romantic tract of country but with the strongest feelings of admiration.

It was in the year 1803, that a young man of independent fortune, who could trace his genealogy to persons of proud distinction, of noble feelings, bearing, and finished education together with the advantages of a handsome and manly person, determined to pass some time at that much frequented rendezvous, Hastings. The smoky, damp atmosphere of London renders the clear and wholesome sea-borne breeze doubly grateful and delicious to our senses; and it was while under the charming influence of renewed vigor and buoyant spirits, that Henry Tancred carefully directed his gallant horse over the steep and dangerous path that led to Fair Light. The sun had not yet descended below the horizon, when he reached the commanding prominence, whence the distant ocean-surf seemed as the gentle rippling of some tranquil tide. Hence, sail after sail skirting the horizon and whitening in the sun, are seen bending their stilly course to foreign climes, while just below, playful children, scarcely discerned, sport on the beach and pick the treasures which the deep has washed upon the shore—the smooth and transparent pebble, or the curious and finely-colored shell. When Tancred had satisfied himself with the beauties of this spirit-stirring scene, he turned his steps towards the mill, hardly knowing wherefore, except to gaze upon an object so rural in the eyes of a citizen. As he approached, a lovely female descended from the rudely constructed steps which led from the door to the ground, carrying a small parcel in her hand. He drew near for the purpose of asking if any person was in possession of the key of the lighthouse, being anxious to view the interior. The female perceiving his intention of accosting her, stopped, to give him an opportunity of doing so. Tancred immediately quickened his pace, and as he came within hearing, exclaimed,

"Can you inform me if I can see the interior of yonder lighthouse?"

"Yes, sir," replied Lucy; for she was no other than the miller's beautiful daughter, "you may see it if you wish, but my father is not now at the mill, and he always keeps the key with him." As she spoke her bright blue eyes rested full upon Tancred, and well they might, for he was a handsome, noble fellow. Her white teeth contrasted beautifully with her fresh and crimson lips, while her sweet and modest voice gave a charm to every word she uttered. She was tall and commanding in figure, yet as active and graceful as a fawn. Tancred was much surprised to see a creature of so much loveliness in so unfrequented a spot. "Can she be a peasant's child? those little hands and feet deny it—perhaps the offspring of some unknown parents, and deposited here for secrecy and safety—or some poor and friendless orphan protected by this generous miller." Such were the nature of his thoughts before he could answer the fair maiden.

"When will your father return?" asked Tancred.

"Before long," replied Lucy, "for the light must be up as soon as the sun goes down; and father always puts it up himself."

"I will wait then," replied he, "if I can find a shed for my horse."

"If you will follow me," said she, "I can show you where he will be perfectly safe, although the accommodation is but poor."

Tancred assented, and accompanied Lucy to the shed beside their little cot, which showed that care and taste went hand in hand to adorn its walls.

"And are you," continued Tancred, "the queen of this neat and beautiful place—these flowers—is it to your fostering care and kind attention that they owe their delicious odor and delicate bloom—this honeysuckle, too, that so tenderly embraces these slender rods placed here for its support—and these tulips, these roses too; are all these the objects of your affection? If so, I could wish to be a flower myself." Tancred looked at her and she blushed. There is something in the blush of a very pretty girl, although no more than a miller's daughter, on which no man but a fool or a villain can gaze without some sort of emotion: as Tancred happened to be neither, he experienced that undefinable and pleasing trouble at the heart which announces the first up-stirring of the passion of passions. It is like the first cloud floating over the clear heavens, which is soon to spread into the heavy vapor charged with elements of discord, or the first ripple on the glassy stream about to be lashed into fury by the coming storm.

It is needless for me to describe how the old silver-headed father came in, and requested his daughter to show the stranger through the lighthouse; how pleased he was with the opportunity of enjoying a little-a-little with his agreeable companion; or how the coming on of a sudden thunder-storm was the occasion of his remaining that night and all the next day, at the hospitable cottage. We will, therefore, hasten over a period of several weeks, during which the gentleman, although he had taken lodgings at —, the adjoining village, managed, accidentally, to lose himself very often in the neighborhood of the mill, and sometimes to be guided into the right road by the miller's daughter. It will be sufficient for the elucidation of my story to state, that one day, being by chance in company with Lucy and her father, Tancred, after divers unsuccessful attempts to speak, and certain unaccountable looks of perplexity, now towards the old man, now towards the girl, who, with her straw-bonnet flung carelessly over her rich and flowing hair, the brightness of her complexion enhanced by exercise, or some other equally potent cause, and a smile of quiet happiness playing in the lurking dimples around her cherry-lips, appeared more than usually beautiful, at length took out his pencil, and wrote something on a piece of paper, which, unnoticed by the miller, he handed to her. The words ran thus: "meet me to-morrow, an hour before sunset, by the spring in the grove, at the foot of the hill. I have a secret to confide to you."

When he had retired to his room, he could think of nothing but Lucy, and his sudden resolution to make her his wife. Although very young, he possessed an independent fortune, and had no opposition to fear from relatives to "lay siege" to his love. Thus then he reasoned with himself: "Here is the very picture my fancy has drawn as the most proper to be my companion. A girl young and fresh in her feelings, beautiful in person, and pure and clear in mind—without fortune, which makes them proud—without relations, which make them obstinate—without fashion, which makes them vain, cold-hearted, artificial, and capricious. If misfortune overtake me, she will be content to live in obscurity; if prosperity attend me, she will enjoy it with gratitude as well as pleasure. Wherefore, then, should she not become my wife?"

The heavy hours of night passed away in these reflections; and at length the time of meeting arrived. If he had suffered any doubts respecting what would be the nature of her reply to his interrogation, they vanished, when, after tracing with anxious step the circuitous route to the grove where a little cool spring gushed up from the sand, and ran bubbling and sparkling to hide itself among the long grass, he perceived the object of his thoughts awaiting his arrival. We pass over the details of an interview, which, however agreeable to the parties concerned, is probably more tolerable in reality than description, and hasten to the period when the important secret was duly communicated to the miller, and the preliminaries of a certain ceremony arranged to his satisfaction.

At this time, Tancred received letters from London requiring his immediate presence, and bade farewell to Lucy, without any melancholy forebodings on either side. Some imagine, that on the eve of any great misfortune, fate warns the victim with feelings of mysterious sadness and gloomy presentiment. I have never found it so. To me, anguish has come when my heart was most overflowing with hope and pleasure, when fancy was busy in sketching scenes of happiness, when the miseries of the past were dim in my recollection, at the very moment when I was becoming convinced that my distrust in human nature was founded on error, and I began to acknowledge that life was not so false and desolate as it had seemed—even then came the sorrow before which my gay thoughts fled like dreams. It was thus with Tancred; and the thunderbolt that shattered his soul, fell from a sky all blue and silent in the hush of the summer-day.

The "spites and crosses" of true love have furnished so many themes for writers, that the story which is now drawing to a tragical conclusion, derives its greatest interest from the fact of its authenticity. It really occurred on the spot which I have endeavored to describe.

Shortly after the departure of Tancred, Fair Light was visited by one of those large parties of pleasure which frequent the watering places of England. Among them was a young officer of the guards, in uniform, whose glittering and brilliant appearance excited very much indeed the admiration of all the females in the place, and among the rest, we grieve to add, of the innocent Lucy. The officer saw the advantage his appearance had already gained, and resolved to avail himself of it to its full extent. He was as much enamored with her as she with him, and contrived unperceived to pay her those nameless delicate and flattering attentions which the admiration and love of female beauty prompt, and which woman is so apt to love. He praised her beautiful cottage; and though last, not least, the sweet charms which she herself possessed. The address of this young man, aided by his captivating apparel, in the course of a little time tended to weaken her fondness for Tancred. He had learned from her conversation the nature of her engagement, and that moment resolved to elope with her if possible. He visited her privately from day to day, unknown to her father, whose occupation took him from home from morning till sun-set; and at length prevailed upon her to accept his hand in lieu of Tancred's. The day came for her departure from her humble roof, and many a heart-rending pang did she suffer. It required indeed all her lover's persuasion and endearing eloquence to support her, when she left a letter for her parent on the old oaken table, informing him of the steps she had taken, whither she had gone, and then quitted his protecting roof for ever.

Tancred having finished his business sooner than he expected, hastened to embrace the sweet object of his love. He entered the little cot, and the afflicting consequence of Lucy's disobedience were soon made known to him. The poor old man was upon his knees, his hands clasped and raised towards heaven. The fatal letter lay on the ground before him. Tancred staggered; a thousand different thoughts rushed upon his mind, he seized the ominous paper, and having perused its contents, rushed from the cottage with the fury of a madman. He traced the course of the fugitives, and by the help of his gallant horse, arrived at the abbey a short time after them, the doors of which being open, and the carriage at the door, he concluded the ceremony was taking place. Pale, and almost breathless, covered with mire, and with large drops of perspiration standing on his brow, he hastily entered. Here he beheld his suspicions realized. Before the altar knelt the graceful form of Lucy and her lover in his uniform. The minister had just pronounced, with emphatic voice, "Wilt thou have this man for thy wedded husband?" and anticipating the full and steady answer "yea," when Tancred silently stepped forward, and bringing himself full to her view, cast upon her a look, at once so heart-broken and forgiving, that the reply she was about to give remained upon her tongue unuttered. She stared terrifically for a moment or two; then, with a loud convulsive shriek, fell into his arms a lifeless corpse!

He then placed her at the feet of the awe-stricken lover, and left them instantly without uttering a single syllable. Strange as it may appear, yet it is nevertheless true, that Tancred was never known from that moment until his death, which did not happen for many years after, to utter a single word even to his dearest friends. The cause of such conduct is still a mystery. Whether the horrid scene had such an effect as to paralyze the powers of speech, or whether it arose from any sudden oath, rashly made, has never been ascertained, but he never afterwards spoke on earth!

LITERARY ANECDOTES.

WE glean a few amusing facts respecting Sir Walter Scott from an anonymous writer in the New Monthly Magazine. Millions of people, whose names he never heard, will be gratified to learn that his late indisposition has passed away. Yet, at his advanced age, we cannot expect he will linger much longer upon the busy stage of life, where he has been such a brilliant performer. Soon, in the ordinary course of events, the "Ilum fuit" will be mournfully spoken by "all the nations." This reflection sheds a deeper interest about his actions.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

ANECDOTES OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

"During the sittings of the court of session, where Scott, by a severe servitude, had secured the situation of chief-clerk, he lived in North-Castle-street, in the new town of Edinburgh; and during the recess of the court, he retired to a romantic house at Ashiesteel, on the Tweed, from which place the beautiful introductions prefixed to 'Marmion' are dated. I have reason to remember his house in North-Castle-street; for various pilgrimages I made before it with the hope of seeing the poet, and though I was gratified at last, I did not succeed till I had in a manner become familiarly acquainted with almost every stone which composed the front of the building. My wanderings, too, were attended with something like an adventure. I have said that the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel' re-echoed my own border feelings. 'Marmion' had a stronger influence still; I resolved to see with my own eyes the man who had contributed so much to my happiness. I did not know a soul in Edinburgh who could introduce me, or rather I had such a sense of my own unworthiness, as compared with so great a poet, that I did not desire an introduction, but strove to see him and peruse his face without being put to the torture of conversation—I could have faced a battery sooner. On the second or third day of my pilgrimage, I had passed and repassed before the house several times, when, to my surprise, a lady looked out at a window in the adjoining house, and calling me by name, desired a servant to open the door and let me in. This was a person of some consideration in my native place, who was residing there with her family, and to whom I was slightly known. 'I saw you,' she said, 'walking up and down, and thought you might as well spend your time here as waste it in the street.' 'I was not exactly wasting it,' I answered: 'I am come to Edinburgh to see Walter Scott, and as he lives here, I hope to see him as he goes into his own house.' 'This is an affair of poetry, then, I find,' said the lady with a smile: 'I cannot help you in it, for I have not the honor of his acquaintance, though his neighbor; but you shall see him, nevertheless, for this is about his time of coming home—and here he is.' 'What?' I said, 'that tall, stalwart man, with the staff in his hand, and —?' 'The same, the same!' answered my friend, laying her hand on my arm; 'speak softly. Why, I protest, he is coming here!' Scott passed his own door, and—the houses of Edinburgh, it must be borne in mind, are as like each other as bricks—walked up the steps of that in which I was, and announced himself with the knocker. He was instantly admitted. He was in some poetic reverie or other, and had made a mistake; he no sooner saw the bonnets of three or four boys on the pegs where he was about to hang his hat, than he said loud enough for us to hear him, 'Hey-day! here's ower mony bairns' bonnets for the house to be mine!' and apologizing to the servant, withdrew hastily.

"Perhaps the finest compliment ever paid him, was at the time of the late coronation, I think. The streets were crowded so densely, that he could not make his way from Charing-cross down to Rose's, in Abingdon-street, though he elbowed ever so stoutly. He applied for help to a serjeant of the Scotch Greys, whose regiment lined the streets. 'Countryman,' said the soldier, 'I am sorry I cannot help you,' and made no exertion. Scott whispered his name—the blood rushed to the soldier's brow—he raised his bridle-hand, and exclaimed, 'Then, by heavens, sir, you shall go down—Corporal Gordon, here—see this gentleman safely to Abingdon-street, come what will!' It is needless to say how well the order was obeyed.

"I have related how I travelled to Edinburgh to see Scott, and how curiously my wishes were fulfilled; years rolled on, and when he came to London to be knighted, I was not so undistinguished as to be unknown to him by name, or to be thought unworthy of his acquaintance. I was given to understand, from what his own Ailie Gourlay calls a sure hand, that a call from me was expected, and that I would be well received. I went to his lodgings, in Piccadilly, with much of the same palpitation of heart which Boswell experienced when introduced to Johnson. I was welcomed with both hands, and such kind, and even complimentary words, that confusion and fear alike forsook me. When I saw him in Edinburgh, he was in the very pith and flush of life—even in my opinion a thought more fat than bard be seems; when I looked on him now, thirteen years had not passed over him and left no mark behind: his hair was growing thin and gray; the stamp of years and study was on his brow: he told me he had suffered much lately from ill-health, and that he once doubted of recovery. His eldest son, a tall, handsome youth—now a major in the army—was with him. From that time, till he left London, I was frequently in his company. He spoke of my pursuits and prospects in life with interest and with feeling—of my little attempts in verse and prose with a knowledge that he had read them carefully—offered to help me to such information as I should require, and even mentioned a subject in which he thought I could appear to advantage. 'If you try your hand on a story,' he observed, 'I would advise you to prepare a kind of skeleton, and when you have pleased yourself with the line of narrative, you may then leisurely clothe it with flesh and blood.' Some years afterwards, I reminded him of this advice. 'Did you follow it?' he inquired. 'I tried,' I said; 'but I had not gone far on the road till some confounded will-o'-wisp came in and dazzled my sight, so that I deviated from the path and never found it again.' 'It is the same way with myself,' said he, smiling; 'I form my plan, and then I deviate.' 'Ay, ay," I replied, "I understand—we both deviate—but you deviate into excellence, and I into absurdity."

"I have seen many distinguished poets, Burns, Byron, Southey, Wordsworth, Campbell, Rogers, Wilson, Crabbe, and Coleridge; but, with the exception of Burns, Scott, for personal vigor, surpasses them all. Burns was, indeed, a powerful man, and Wilson is celebrated for feats of strength and agility; I think, however, the stalworth frame, the long nervous arms, and well-knit joints of Scott are worthy of the best days of the Border, and would have gained him distinction at the foray which followed the feast of spurs. On one occasion he talked of his ancestry; Sir Thomas Lawrence, I think, was present. One of his forefathers, if my memory is just, sided with the parliament in the Civil War, and the family estate suffered curtailment in consequence. To make amends, however, his son, resolving not to commit the error of his father, joined the Pretender, and with his brother was engaged in that unfortunate adventure which ended in a skirmish and captivity at Preston, in 1715. It was the fashion of those times for all persons of the rank of gentlemen to wear scarlet waistcoats—a ball had struck one of the brothers and carried a part of this dress into his body; it was also the practice to strip the captives. Thus wounded, and nearly naked, having only a shirt on and an old sack about him, the ancestor of the great poet was sitting along with his brother, and a hundred and fifty unfortunate gentlemen in a granary at Preston. The wounded man fell sick, as the story goes, and vomited the scarlet which the ball had forced into the wound. 'Lord, Wattie!' cried the brother, 'if you have got a wardrobe in your wame, I wish ye would bring me a pair of breeks, for I have meikle need of them.' The wound healed—I know not whether he was one of those fortunate men who mastered the guard at Newgate, and escaped to the continent.

"The mystery which hung so long over the authorship of the Waverley novels, was cleared up by a misfortune which all the world deplores, and which would have crushed any other spirit than that of Scott. This stroke of evil fortune did not, perhaps, come quite unexpected; it was, however, unavoidable; and it arose from no mismanagement or miscalculation of his own, unless I may consider—which I do not—his embarking in the hazards of a printing-house, a piece of miscalculation. It is said, that he received warnings: the paper of Constable the bookseller, or, to speak plainer, long money-bills were much in circulation; one of them, for a large sum, made its appearance in the Bank of Scotland, with Scott's name upon it, and a secretary sent for Sir Walter. 'Do you know,' said he, 'that Constable has many such bills abroad?—Sir Walter, I warn you.' 'Well,' answered Sir Walter, 'it is, perhaps, as you say, and I thank you: but' (raising his voice) 'Archib Constable was a good friend to me when friends were rarer than now, and I will not see him balked for the sake of a few thousand pounds.' The amount of the sum for which Scott, on the failure of Constable, became responsible, I have heard various accounts of,—varying from fifty to seventy thousand pounds. Some generous and wealthy person sent him a blank check, properly signed, upon the bank, desiring him to fill in the sum, and relieve himself; but he returned it, with proper acknowledgments. He took, as it were, the debt upon himself, as a loan, the whole payable, with interest, in ten years; and to work he went, with head, and heart, and hand, to amend his broken fortunes. I had several letters from him during these disastrous days: the language was cheerful, and there were no allusions to what had happened. It is true, there was no occasion for him to mention these occurrences to me; all that he said about them was, 'I miss my daughter, Mrs. Lockhart, who used to sing to me—I have some need of her now.' No general, after a bloody and disastrous battle, ever set about preparing himself for a more successful contest than did this distinguished man. Work succeeded work with unheard of rapidity; the chief of which was the 'Life of Napoleon Bonaparte,' in nine volumes—a production of singular power, and an almost perfect work, with the exception of the parts which treat of the French revolution, and the captivity of the great prisoner. I had the curiosity, on seeing one of the reviews praising Hazlitt's description of the battle of the Pyramids, to turn to the account of Scott. I need not say which was the best: Scott's was like the sounding of a trumpet. The present cheap and truly elegant edition of the works of the author of 'Waverley,' has, with its deservedly unrivalled sale, relieved the poet from his difficulties, and the cloud which hung so long over the towers of Abbotsford, has given place to sunshine.

"Of Abbotsford itself, the best description ever given, at least the briefest, was 'A Romance in stone and lime.' It is a Gothic structure, of irregular form, with towers, and pinnacles, and battlements,—plenty of variety without, and abundance of accommodation within,—the fair Tweed running beside it; the magnificent ruins of Melrose rising at no great distance; while the Eildon hills, cloven three by the magic of Old Michael, are in the neighborhood. All around, too, lie battle fields, and hills, and streams, renowned in song and story. In the interior there is a fine armoury, exhibiting all kinds of old Scottish mail and weapons; and a splendid library, of which one curious corner contains three or four hundred strange volumes on witchcraft and demonology. A marble bust, by Chantrey, of Scott himself—a present from the artist—stands in the library. All the nations of the earth are by this time acquainted with this fine work of art; two thousand casts were surreptitiously shipped to America, and fifteen hundred to the West Indies, during one year, and multitudes to other parts of the world. It would require a volume to describe all the curiosities, ancient and modern, living and dead, which are here gathered together. I say living, because a menagerie might be formed out of birds and beasts, sent as presents from distant lands. A friend told me he was at Abbotsford one evening, when a servant announced, 'A present from'—I forget what chieftain in the North. 'Bring it in,' said the poet. The sound of strange feet were soon heard, and in came two beautiful Shetland ponies, with long manes and uncut tails, and so small, that they might have been sent to Ellland to the Queen of the Fairies herself. One poor Scotsman, to show his gratitude for some kindness Scott, as sheriff, had shown him, sent two kangaroos from New Holland; and Washington Irving lately told me, that some Spaniard or other, having caught two young wild Andalusian boars, consulted him how he might have them sent to the author of the 'Vision of Don Roderick.'

"This distinguished poet and novelist is now some sixty years old— hale, fresh, and vigorous, with his imagination as bright, and his conceptions as clear and graphic as ever. I have now before me a dozen or fifteen volumes of his poetry, including his latest—'Halidon Hill,' one of the most heroically-touching poems of modern times—and somewhere about eighty volumes of his prose: his letters, were they collected, would amount to fifty volumes more. Some authors—though not in this land—have been even more prolific; but their progeny were ill-formed at their birth, and could never walk alone; whereas, the mental offspring of our illustrious countryman came healthy and vigorous into the world, and promise long to continue. To vary the metaphor—the tree of some other men's fancy bears fruit at the rate of a pint of apples to a peck of crabs; whereas the tree of the great magician bears the sweetest fruit—large and red-cheeked—fair to look upon, and right pleasant to the taste. I shall conclude with the words of Sir Walter, which no man can contradict, and which many can attest: 'I never refused a literary person of merit, such service in smoothing his way to the public as was in my power; and I had the advantage—rather an uncommon one with our irritable race—to enjoy general favor, without incurring permanent ill-will, so far as is known to me, among any of my cotemporaries.'

FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

This institution will soon close after having been visited by large numbers. The paintings have been often publicly noticed in terms of approbation; and have elicited an attention from the community, which, while it cannot but flatter the artist, confirms our hope that the arts will hereafter be cherished among us with more fostering care. We learn, with pleasure, that among the many and various amusements of the city, this rational and innocent exhibition has not been overlooked.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Bourne—"that Bourne, from whence no traveller returns," without being delighted with his abundant supply of music, has issued several new and prettily executed pieces. Besides the quintette, "Midst doubts confusing," the recitative and duet of "Whence this soft and pleasing flame," from the opera of Cinderella, he has just published the "Taglioni Waltz," with an engraving; "He passed as if he knew me not!" written by Thomas Haynes Bayly; "My bark is my cursor," composed by Mr. Jones, the poetry selected from the American; "I must tune up my harp's broken strings;" the "Zephyr;" and four new waltzes, entitled "Le Souvenir," "Le Soupire," "Le Desir," "Le Plaisir." These pieces are fine impressions; and the fact that a careful attention is paid to their accuracy, gives them an additional value.

THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

Mr. FINN has been playing at the Park with Mr. Hackett. Cinderella seems to be the choice on benefit nights. As Mrs. Sharpe is deservedly a general favorite, we regret her partiality for the character of Kate O'Brien. It has been represented much better by Miss Clara Fisher, who enters with a peculiar and natural naïveté into all its elegance and humor; and this courting of comparisons should have been obviated by a musty proverb in the school-book too well known to be quoted. Mrs. Sharpe should not presume so far upon the good nature of the audience, and, although by pursuing this course, she may reach mediocrity in various spheres, she will excel in none. She has been justly praised in several other parts, where she is always respectable and sometimes admirable.

The Bowery is taking a lead in tragedy. Since our last Cooper, Booth and Hamblin, have appeared in conjunction in the play of Julius Cæsar. This afforded an admirable opportunity for the display of the peculiar talent of these performers, without bringing them into collision. Cooper occasionally exhibited in Mark Antony, much of the vigor that characterized his youthful days; the philosophic Brutus was ably sustained by Hamblin; and Booth gave more than the usual interest to the "lean and hungry Cassius." We are pleased to perceive that Mrs. Hamblin has returned to these boards, and that Mrs. Duff has also been engaged.

The Chatham has closed with the suddenness of an apopleptic fit. Two theatres are well enough in this city for the sake of competition. Three cannot exist decently. There were several actors of merit at this establishment, whose efforts were almost neutralized by the want of support. The only thing of note produced there is Mr. Payne's play of Oswald; for which Mr. Adams, who brought it from London, deserves credit. The epilogue to this piece was furnished by Woodworth. It is too good to be lost, and here it is.

EPILOGUE.

Spoken by Mrs. Hughes in the character of Zofreni

Don't be alarm'd because you saw me slain,
And now behold me on the stage again:
For you must know, we murder here "in jest;"
But had it been in earnest, could I rest
In quiet, think ye, even in the grave,
When my appearance Oswald might save?
You know how cleverly I rush'd between
The "angel" and fate—there, in my dying scene;
And if I tell a martyr for him there,
In the same cause I've yet some breath to spare.

My turban'd Turkish tyrant lover said,
That I, among the dying and the dead,
When Moslem wraths his bolts of vengeance hurl'd,
"Hang like an angel o'er a blazing world."
'Twas most gallantly spoken for a Turk,
The ruthless author of that bloody work;
What then, ye free-born Christians, ought to be
Your exclamation—when you witness me
Rise from the bier to intercede for one,
Whom you are proud to call "Columbia's son;"
For though no stoics, you will not disdain
To own the pleasure you've derived from Payne.

'Tis not in ghostly costume I appear—
No bullet wound—no crimson stain is here:
I'm not a shade, or spectre, good or evil—
Nor am I quite an angel, or a devil;
No spirit of the air—or fire—or flood—
But true substantial female flesh and blood;
Disclaiming powers and titles super-human
Though a true patriot, I am still a woman;
As such, I love the youth who bravely fights
For country—freedom—and for female rights;
As such, I come to plead our poet's cause,
And ask a verdict in your kind applause.

To the Pit

Why do you smile, there—Mr. Zolius—say—
I know you well—you once produced a play,
And said we actors damn'd it!—let that pass—
Bards must be civil when their house is glass.
And you, Sir Critic—who one night—don't start—
Assum'd the buskin—and—forgot your part!
You'll be indulgent, won't you? nay, for shame!
Don't look so frighten'd—I'll not tell your name.

To the first circle of Boxes.

Ay, there is sunshine in this sparkling crescent;
Those smiling faces promise something pleasant.
Were Payne but here, how he would idolize
This starry galaxy of laughing eyes!
Who's he that sits behind you lady?—Pshaw!
That maumoth hat!—what do you wear it for?
Why not confine your ringlets, puffs and curls
In a neat turban, like our Grecian girls?
There are some eyes behind that monstrous screen,
That might smile kindly—could they but be seen.
Egad—I've caught one!—thank you—that's enough—
You're on the free-list, sir, and we expect a puff!

To the upper circles.

To you who choose a more exalted station,
We look with confidence for approbation;
For elevated souls, in every age,
Have been the friends of genius and the stage:
And never be it said, that our own Payne,
Pleaded for mercy to the gods in vain.

This was delivered with much grace and effect, and received with peals of applause. Any trembling author who wishes to lanch off his play with a merry epilogue, we recommend to call on Woodworth.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

PASSAGES FROM A JOURNAL.

THE worst men are not always found among the greatest criminals, nor the most melancholy dispositions among those who seem the saddest, any more than those gifted with the highest genius and virtues on the lists of fame. There is a kind of malefactor whose wickedness actually proceeds from noble qualities of the mind and the heart. There are others who owe their correct deportment to cowardice and coldness of feeling. Pure generosity unchecked, sometimes creates the spendthrift and the debtor. The most contemptible meanness has formed the thriving, prosperous, and irreproachable citizen—of course these are exceptions to general rules. He who with warm impulses exercises his liberality according to his means, is in the true medium. The same causes have shaped characters apparently widely different, while exactly opposite causes have produced others which a superficial observer would conceive to be the same. S. and D. are both dark and gloomy misanthropes. They fly from pleasure, detest children, shun female society with the bitterest sarcasms, and one would almost believe, hate the very light of day. Nature made S. exactly what he is. He is absorbed in himself and his selfish plans, and is in reality not discontented with his lot. D., on the contrary, is naturally ardent, affectionate, buoyant, and merry. Domestic misfortunes have injured the springs of his mind. He flies from children and women, not because he dislikes them, but because they call up thoughts of his own family, with whom he once lived in a distant country. In proportion as he was happy then, he is miserable now.

"Dearly bought the hidden treasure
Finer feelings can bestow;
Chords that vibrate sweetest pleasure,
Thrill the deepest notes of woe."

I have sometimes observed a peculiarity respecting character which may at first sight appear paradoxical. The most honest in their business affairs, and who sustain the most unspotted character abroad, are often, in their own domestic circle, the most unsocial, tasteless, and tyrannical; while the scoundrel of a swindler, who cheats every one, and contracts debts which he never intends to pay, has a lovely wife and sweet children at home, ignorant of his true character, who look up to him and love him as a model of goodness and perfection. The reason of this is perhaps that the upright citizen stakes his reputation and rests his thoughts upon his character in the market, and therefore puts no restraint upon the natural roughness of his manners, while the other, knowing that he deserves no praise for his transactions abroad, ashamed of the part he has there acted, and perhaps really gifted with a kind and pleasure-loving disposition, strives to compromise with his conscience for the guilt of defrauding those for whom he has no personal affection, by rendering those around him happy.

I remember once having had occasion, as an executor, to prosecute a suit against a Mr. Thompson. My lawyer informed me that he knew the person well. "It is almost hopeless," said he, "to continue your action, for although the fellow has a lucrative business, is independent of the world, and could, if it so pleased him, pay off every debt and lead an honest and reputable life, yet he is cursed with a natural propensity to cheat his fellow-creatures. I believe with him it is a sort of agreeable excitement, like gambling, which habit has rendered necessary. He has been so long availing himself of every deficiency and quibble of the law, is so well versed in the practice of our various courts of justice, and understands so well the arts by which liabilities may be eluded, that I can promise you very little advantage from the suit."

I do not distinctly recollect the means by which he escaped our vigilance; but the claim was never recovered, and Mr. Thompson laughed at us in his sleeve. I could not even catch a glimpse of the fellow, whom, however, I pictured in my imagination as a ferocious and black-browed looking bully, rendered hideous by every repulsive quality, both of mind and person.

Many months afterwards, when indeed the affair had almost escaped my memory, I was one quiet summer afternoon, invited by a friend to accompany him on a sailing expedition. We started from Whitehall in a light fine sail-boat. The first almost imperceptible shadow of evening was just cooling the air and softening the landscape. The sun had disappeared from the cloudless sky, leaving behind him a radiant track of blended orange and crimson, which stole up to the very summit of the heavens. Our little bark floated through the water, and bore us to a cottage on the opposite shore, where we landed and left our boat in care of a servant.

"I will introduce you," said my companion, "to a friend of mine, who has selected this charming spot—built the neat and beautiful dwelling, and decorated it as you see. He is of a kind and hospitable disposition, and will meet you with a cordial welcome. Among the attractions which I know will afford you pleasure, his wife and children are by no means the most unimportant."

A gentleman stepped out, as he finished speaking, from the wicket-gate, which, by the side of the highly cultivated and bright-looking garden, led on to the grassy and deep-green lawn which fronted the mansion. The building was low and plain, but spacious. The exterior was of that clear white, which, in the country, gleams so prettily through the foliage. Several vines of different kinds were springing up luxuriantly around the columns which supported the piazzas; green blinds shaded the windows, and many large trees grew around in groups, some lifting their tall trunks high in the air; others spreading their low thick and tangled branches so as to form a more impenetrable shade. Altogether, the scene wore that air of striking neatness and pleasant quiet, which touches the mind wearied with the city's din, and awakens idle dreams of retirement and rural happiness.

The evening dew was just falling upon the fields, the vines, trees, and flowers, and called forth the delicious perfume of a thousand breathing plants. A bright star flashed like a lonely diamond on the brow of night; and the water dashed gently against the beach. I thought I had scarcely ever beheld a scene more beautiful.

A glance discovered to me what I have taken so long to describe, and I had no sooner cast around me a look of admiration than the stranger took me kindly by the hand, and by his gentlemanly and graceful attentions made me feel immediately on the footing of an old friend.

The rooms were furnished with taste bordering on splendor, with a costly piano, massive mahogany tables of the deepest and richest stain, flute, library, and pictures. The Spectator, Shakspeare, Byron, Shelley, Coleridge, Keats and White, were lying on the stand, London editions, in russet binding. But, as my friend predicted, the wife and children were irresistible. The former was young and shy, but very pretty, the fairest of all fair complexions; a mouth, which—but being a married lady she shall go undescribed, although her eyes were large and blue, and her foot the "loveliest of remembered things." The children, two boys and two girls, were, if possible, an improvement of the mother. The same silken hair, but of a brighter gold; the same style of face, but more perfect and shadowless; such warm, earnest, radiant countenances, as enchain the attention like a spell, and make one's soul sink within him, that he is not a painter; and as for their voices, they may talk of operas, recitatives, choruses; they may even tell of the humming of bees, the rustling of branches and the gurgling of waters, but give me the tone of a sweet child when its spirit is awake, and the brightness of its new-born thoughts is glowing on its cheek, and flashing in its eyes. A meal, the zest for which was by no means diminished by our admiration of every thing around, being finished, the affectionate husband and father, with a kind of pride as graceful as it was well grounded, led his wife to the piano. The brilliancy of her playing, and the taste and feeling with which she sang surprised me. I was yet more agreeably disappointed, when her husband placed before her a duet, and accompanied her with a voice so deep, rich, and mellow, that the very children gathered around and listened in silence. We were afterwards called to admire some paintings.

"I love paintings," said our host, "and could not live without them any more than without music. For this one," continued he, "I paid five hundred dollars, and the same for the one opposite. They are said to be originals by Raphael, and at least perplex the most practised connoisseur; and now," added he, in a lively tone, as his little daughter put up her red lips to kiss him, and shook back the masses of golden curls from her lovely face, "let us have a dance, my children, and then the little ones must be off to bed."

They were just four, and as they performed a lively dance which they had been taught by their mother, I was much struck with the affectionate pleasure which the father took in contemplating them, and the good sense and benevolence which he discovered in his words as well as his actions. A smile of perfect content overspread his handsome face as he spoke: "you see, gentlemen, where I find my happiness. To me these are the treasures of the world, and this spot its centre. My philosophy instructs me that whatever makes this scene pleasant, beautiful or attractive—whatever renders it more delightful to me, or enhances the cheerfulness and joy of these its careless inmates, is of the highest importance and value. Besides this the world offers me absolutely nothing. Fame, wealth, travel, power, the opinion of men, are all such vain and empty things to me, that I wonder when I read what pains my fellow-creatures take to obtain them. I pursue my business only to insure a uniform and moderate income, which leaves me abundant leisure to enjoy rural sports and domestic occupations. I am fond of reading, music, drawing; I dote on my wife and children; as long as they are happy, I am content, and have nothing to disturb my uniform tranquillity but the fear that one day the circle may be broken—that sickness may seize one of these dear beings—that some bright head may be missed from the groupe before me—that some sweet voice may be hushed." I thought I perceived something like moisture in his eyes. I am sure I felt a sort of dimness in my own. I shook him by the hand as he said "good night," with a respect, admiration, and love, rarely excited on so brief an acquaintance.

We put forth in our little boat from the shore. Starry night now usurped the sky, and the city, with its innumerable flashing lights, lay stretched out before us on the water.

"That man," said I, "is a model. He is the best, the truest, and the happiest philosopher that ever existed."

"He is the most unprincipled rascal I ever knew," said my companion. "His beautiful house and grounds have been paid for by confiding creditors, whom he has cheated deliberately out of thousands. I would not trust him with a dollar. I admire his family, who are totally unacquainted with his dishonest habits. He really loves them, and well he may, for often they have saved him when he was actually in danger. He has now, however, taken the benefit of the act. You see how he lives. He will cheat you if he can. You cannot judge of men in a hurry, and nothing is more deceptive than character." My friend spoke of Mr. Thompson. SEDLEY.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—Parables, if ingeniously managed, are always striking. The mind is, at every moment, delighted with the discovery of the resemblance between the story and the reality which it is intended to illustrate. The force with which, in the scriptures, the most important truths are displayed by this ingenious method, affords a strong argument in favor of its use in conveying vivid impressions, which, if communicated in abstract rule or precept, would want charm to make them attractive, and power to render them distinct and lasting. The one which I have taken leave to select for your pages, is a fine elucidation of the confidence which the spirit should feel even in the last crisis of expiring nature. He who has studied life attentively must experience the need of some support, which the mind requires, but too frequently requires in vain, amid the weariness and disappointments of the world. In this respect what an incalculable advantage is possessed by him who can commit himself fearlessly to the dark abyss with the assurance of soon entering a better world beyond. PORTIA.

LIFE AND LOVE—A PARABLE.

In the depths of a cave young Life awoke as if from sleep. And because she knew not where she was, or whose hand had awakened her, she gazed intently towards the darkness behind her, and softly said, "Whence am I?"

When none answered, she lifted up her voice and cried aloud, "Whence am I?"

The cry resounded through the depths of the cave, and was heard in lower depths, and lower, till it died away into silence.

Yet was there no reply.

Then the spirit turned towards the mouth of the cave. Roses hung around it, and the vine put forth its clusters among the roses.

One stood without, watching till young Life should come forth into the sunshine. When she saw the angel, she marvelled at the beauty of his countenance, and said,

"Comest thou from the depths even as I?"

And the angel answered, "Thou hast arisen out of darkness, but I dwell in the midst of light. Thou art but now awakened; but I have gone to and fro for ages of ages. I am from Him who awakened thee, and my name is Love. Fear nothing, for I can guard thee whithersoever thou goest. Call on me, and I will be nigh."

Then seeing that the spirit looked on the flowers and fruits that hung around, he smiled, and laid aside the palm-rod that he bore, and gathered of the roses as many as she would: and the fruits which hung aloft he held within her reach.

When she went forward, at length, the whole earth was fair before her. She roved the meadows, and bounded over the hills, and trod the paths of the groves till she was wearied and athirst.

Then she looked around for the angel, but she beheld him not.

Remembering that he had promised to come when she had need, she called on his name; and he was there.

And he rebuked her, saying, "Are there not messengers sent unto thee from above and from beneath, and thou regardest them not? Wherefore art thou faint, when they are around thee, who shall renew thy strength?"

Then Life gazed steadfastly, and saw that a multitude of spirits were near. They uprose from the flowers of the field, and thronged the thickets of the forest. They issued from the abyss, and came down from among the stars. They sang amid the clouds on the mountain-top, and their music floated on the still lake.

When the young spirit held out her arms, they came unto her, and ministered unto her more and more continually.

The angel Love also blessed her. When her path lay through the sultry desert, he made a shade for her with his wings. He opened a way for her in the tangled wilderness, and soothed her when the tempest burst around her head.

When she asked, "Shall there be always snares, and burning heats, and tempests?" he replied,

"Nay; but for a while. When thou art on yonder summit, a cloud shall bear thee where such things are not."

As she drew nigh the mountain, they that thronged around her went back one by one, so that when she reached the summit, behold! she was alone.

And she saw a thick black cloud rolling towards her, and fearing to be swept away, she clung to the earth, and cried fearfully to the angel; but he was no where seen.

Then the skirts of the cloud hid from her the gay, bright earth; and a heavy chill fell on her.

And as the damps compassed her round about, one looked forth brightly from the cloud and smiled.

It was the angel. He held forth his hand, saying,

"Though thou hast oftentimes forgotten me, behold me here in thy utmost need."

Then was revealed bright glory within the cloud, and the spirit sprang into it eagerly.

And as they sailed away into the ether, the angel cleft the cloud with his rod, and showed unto his charge the path she had traversed. The glory in which she lay fell upon it, and made it wholly beautiful. The waters which had been dark now gleamed, and the tangled forest waved majestically in the golden light.

When she looked upwards, she saw how the radiance spread unto the depths of the heaven till her dazzled eye could see no further.

"Farest thou?" said the angel, as she bowed her head;

"I lead thee unto Him who awakened thee out of darkness."

"I would fain behold him," she replied; "and what should I fear when I am with thee?"

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

MESSEURS. EDITORS—I am a belle, and a beauty—and that is saying all in one word. I have a great many admirers, and two lovers, who occasion me serious perplexity. They are so equally balanced that neither papa, mama, nor I can tell which of the two to choose, Mortimer or Mordecai. Mordecai is the richest, but then he has such a droll name. I should not like to be called Mrs. Mordecai Todhunter—should you, Messrs. Editors? Mortimer has the prettiest barouche, but Mordecai has the handsomest country-seat, with a lake and a temple to the goddess Serious, I think they call her. She must have been a humdrum sort of a creature by her name. As to personal accomplishments and appearance, they are pretty equally balanced, except that Mortimer drives his barouche the most gracefully, and wears his face behind his whiskers in the most fashionable style. Papa and mama, who are extremely anxious for my happiness, have made the most particular inquiries about their fortunes, and papa says Mordecai beats the other by about two thousand. But then Mortimer is such a pretty name—don't you think it worth two thousand dollars? Papa says that Mortimer has also got a beautiful pigeon-house, at his country-seat, which is a good offset to the temple of Serious. I have a vast deal of trouble in making up my mind between the two, and am sometimes almost afraid I shall lose one or both of my admirers before I can come to a decision. Mordecai already begins to be rather attentive to my cousin Agnes, but I don't fear her, as she is neither a belle nor a beauty. I wish you would assist me in this perplexity, and favor me with your advice, which, however, I don't promise to follow, unless agreeable. Adieu.

FLIRTINA ARRY.

P. S. I have said nothing of the talents and moral character of my admirers, as papa says that the only good men worth having are the good men on 'change.

F. A.

REMARKS.—We cannot refuse a request from a lady; it goes against our conscience. Though it is really a puzzling case, and demands serious consideration. Let us see. The two thousand dollars, viz. the hard name, the pigeon-house and the temple of Serious—who is not, however, a goddess of our acquaintance. Manners, morals, and acquirements out of the question. What a pity our fair correspondent cannot marry both of them! As this is, however, quite impossible, we humbly suggest the propriety of taking two straws of unequal length, calling one Mortimer, the other Mordecai, and drawing lots, selecting the longest straw for a husband.—Eds.

Lines to a Little Girl.

By James Mack.

THE young affections of a heart,
Where nothing of impure has part;
Oh, these are treasures dearer far
Than all the gems of India are!

My child, it has not oft been mine
To win a heart so pure as thine;
And all who shared my love's caress
Have left me to my loneliness!

For scarce in childhood can I find
One faithful heart or grateful mind;
But I would hope it so may be
That I have found them both in thee;

For when on mine thy dear eyes play,
I read in them affection's ray;
And then I feel, my pretty dove,
I love thee with a brother's love!

Shouldst thou not change, and shouldst thou not
Be torn from me, whate'er my lot,
Thy pure affections were a balm
That might my every sorrow calm.

While those affections in thee dwell,
My child, my heart must love thee well;
But mine a love of little worth,
And little that of all the earth!

The only love that is not vain
Is that which doth to God attain;
And if thy heart on Him be placed,
Thou shalt be in His love embraced.

How I would bless thee every hour,
My cherub child, had I the power!
But God, the source of every good,
Alone can bless thee as I would!

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

LIGHT.

THE phenomena of light are, perhaps, more extraordinary than all the other wonders of nature. The penetration of the learned has vainly endeavored to search into its mystery. That it can be produced by rubbing two sticks together, or striking one stone against another—that it should be so blended and so separated in the rainbow and prism, are inexplicable, however well defined the rules by which it acts. The contemplation of these subjects fills the mind with agreeable and elevating thoughts, and accustoms youth to intelligent observations and reflections.

We have been gratified with reading a Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy, by I. W. F. Herschel, esq., recently published in London. From it we make the following extract:

Every body knows that objects viewed through a transparent medium, such as water or glass, appear distorted or displaced. Thus a stick in water appears bent, and an object seen through a prism, or wedge of glass, seems to be thrown aside from its true place. This effect is owing to what is called the refraction of light; and a simple rule, discovered by Willebrod Snell, enables any one exactly to say how much the stick will be bent, and how far, and in what direction, the apparent situation of an object seen through the glass will deviate from the real one. If a shilling be laid at the bottom of a basin of water, and viewed obliquely, it will appear to be raised by the water; if instead of water, spirits of wine be used, it will appear more raised, if oil, still more; but in none of these cases will it appear to be thrown aside to the right or left of its true place, however the eye be situated. The plane in which are contained the eye, the object, and the point in the surface of the liquid at which the object is seen, is an upright, or vertical plane; and this is one of the principal characters in the ordinary refraction of light; viz. that the ray by which we see an object through a refracting surface, although it undergoes a bending, and is, as it were, broken at the surface, yet, in pursuing its course to the eye, does not quit a plane perpendicular to the refracting surface. But there are again other substances, such as rock-crystal, and especially Iceland spar, which possess the singular property of doubling the image or appearance of an object seen through them in certain directions; so that instead of seeing one object we see two, side by side, when such a crystal or spar is interposed between the object and the eye; and if a ray, or small sunbeam be thrown upon a surface of either of these substances, it will be split into two, making an angle with each other, and each pursuing its own separate course—this is called double refraction. Now, of these images, or double refracted rays, one always follows the same rule as if the substance were glass or water: its deviations can be correctly calculated by Snell's law, above mentioned, and it does not quit the plane perpendicular to the refracting surface. The other ray, on the contrary, (which is therefore said to have undergone extraordinary refraction) does quit that plane, and the amount of its deviation from its former course requires for its determination a much more complicated rule, which cannot be understood or even stated without a pretty intimate knowledge of geometry. Now, rock crystal and Iceland spar, differ from glass in a very remarkable circumstance. They effect naturally certain regular figures, not being formed in shapeless lumps, but in determinate geometrical forms; and they are susceptible of being cleft or split much easier in certain directions than in others; they have a grain, which glass has not. When other substances have this peculiarity (and which are called crystalized substances) were examined, they were all, or by far the greater part, found to possess the singular property of double refraction: and it was very natural to conclude, therefore, that the same thing took place in all of them, viz. that of the two rays into which any beam of light falling on the surface of such a substance was split, or of the two images of an object seen through it, one only was turned aside out of its plane, and extraordinarily refracted, while the other followed the ordinary rule. Accordingly this was supposed to be the case: and not only so; but from some trials and measurements purposely made, by a philosopher of great eminence, it was considered to be a fact sufficiently established by experiment.

Perhaps we might have remained long under this impression, for the measurements are delicate, and the subject very difficult. But it has lately been demonstrated by an eminent French philosopher and mathematician, M. Fresnel, that granting certain principles or postulates, all the phenomena of double refraction, including perhaps the greatest variety of facts that have ever been arranged under one general head, may be satisfactorily explained and deducted from them, by strict mathematical calculation; and that, when applied to the cases first mentioned, those principles give a satisfactory account of the want of the extraordinary image: that, when applied to such cases as those of rock crystal or Iceland spar, they also give a correct account of both the images, and agree in their conclusions with the rules before ascertained for them: but so far from coinciding with that part of the previous statement, which would make these conclusions extend to all crystalized substances, M. Fresnel's principles lead to a conclusion quite opposite, and point to a fact which never had been observed, viz. that in by far the greater number of crystalized substances, which possess the property of double refraction, neither of the images follows the ordinary law, but both undergo a deviation from the original plane. Now, this had never been observed in any previous trial, and all opinion was against it. But when put to the test of experiment in a great variety of new and ingenious methods, it was found to be fully verified; and to complete the evidence, the substances on whose imperfect examination the first erroneous conclusion was founded, having been lately subjected to a fresh, and more scrupulous examination, the result has shown the insufficiency of the former measurements, and proved in perfect accordance with the newly discovered laws. Now, it will be observed in this case, first, that so far from the principles assumed by M. Fresnel being at all obvious, they are extremely remote from ordinary observation; and, secondly, that the chain of reasoning by which they are brought to the test, is one of such length and complexity, and the purely mathematical difficulty of the application so great, that no more good estimate can be formed of the chance of error, than of the triumph of chance. They show at once how large a part pure reason has to perform in our examination of nature, and how implicit our reliance ought to be on that powerful and methodical system of rules and processes, which constitute the modern mathematical analysis, in all the more difficult applications of exact calculations to her phenomena.

To take an instance more within ordinary apprehension. An eminent living geometer has proved, by calculations founded on strict optical principles, that in the centre of the shadow of a small circular plate of metal, exposed in a dark room to a beam of light emanating from a very small brilliant point, there ought to be no darkness, in fact, no shadow at that place; but on the contrary, a degree of illumination precisely as bright as if the metal plate were away. Strange, and even impossible as this conclusion may seem, it has been put to the trial, and found perfectly correct.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Encyclopædia Americana. A popular dictionary of arts, sciences, literature, history, politics, and biography, brought down to the present time, &c. &c. on the basis of the seventh edition of the German Conversations-Lexicon. Edited by Francis Lieber. Assisted by E. Wigglesworth and T. G. Bradford. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. pp. 607. vol. vi. 8vo. 1831.

This is one of the best and most useful publications ever issued from the American press. It contains an invaluable collection of information on a vast variety of subjects, arranged with great care, and sold at so moderate a rate as to render the price altogether disproportioned to the real excellence of the work. It is to be completed in twelve large octavo volumes, of between six and seven hundred pages each, elegantly printed and bound in cloth, at two dollars and fifty cents per volume. We extract from the last the sketch of

HAYDN.

"Joseph Haydn was born 1732, in the village of Rohrau, on the borders of Hungary and Austria. His father, a poor wheelwright, played on the harp on Sundays, his mother accompanying with her voice. When the boy was five years old, he used, during his parents' performance, to make motions with a board and a stick, as if he was playing the violin. A schoolmaster, whom accident led to this concert, observing that Joseph kept good time, asked permission to take him to his school. Here he learned to read and write, and received instruction in singing and in playing on the violin and other instruments. After he had been here two years, he became, at the age of eight years, a chorister in St. Stephen's. At the age of ten years, he composed pieces for six or eight voices. "I then thought," he afterwards remarked, laughingly, "that the blacker the paper, the finer the music." With the loss of his fine soprano, he lost his place, in his sixteenth year. His situation was now very discouraging, and he had a foretaste of the difficulties which await an artist without fortune or patrons. He gave instructions in music, played in the orchestra, and occupied himself with composing. "With my worm-eaten harpsichord," said he, "I did not envy the lot of kings." At that time, the six first sonatas of Emanuel Bach fell into his hands. "I did not leave the harpsichord," said he, "until they were played through, from beginning to end; and any one who knows me must perceive that I owe much to Emanuel Bach; that I have carefully studied his style; and he himself once paid me a compliment about it." The youth at length had the good fortune to become acquainted with a Mlle. de Martinez, the friend of Matasias. He instructed her in singing and playing on the harpsichord, for which he received his board and lodging. The first opera-poet of the age, and the best composer of symphonies, thus lived in the same house, though in very different circumstances. The poet, honored with the favor of the court, lived in the midst of pleasures, while the poor musician was obliged to pass the days in bed, for want of fuel. When Mlle. de Martinez left Vienna, Haydn was again plunged into the greatest distress. He retired into the suburb of Leopoldstadt, where a hairdresser took him into his house. This residence had a fatal influence over the rest of his life. He married the daughter of his host, who poisoned his happiest days. Haydn was eighteen years old when he composed his first quartetto, which met with general success, and encouraged him to new efforts. At the age of nineteen he composed the Devil on Two Sticks, an opera which was forbidden, on account of its satirical character, after its third representation. Haydn now became so celebrated, that prince Esterhazy placed him at the head of his private chapel. For this prince he composed some beautiful symphonies—a department in which he excelled all other composers—and the greatest part of his fine quartetts. Here he also composed the symphony known by the name of Haydn's Departure, in which one instrument stops after another, and each musician, as soon as he has finished, puts out his light, rolls up his note-book, and retires. When, after a period of about twenty years, the prince Esterhazy reduced his court, and Haydn received his discharge, he went to London, to which he had often been invited. In 1794, he made a second journey thither. He found a most splendid reception, and the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of music. In England, Haydn first became generally known; he had not enjoyed an extensive reputation in his native country. On his return from England, he purchased a small house and garden in one of the suburbs of Vienna. Here he composed the Creation and the Seasons. The former work, which is full of the fire of youth, was finished in his sixty-fifth year. The Seasons, his last work, was completed in eleven months. Among his numerous works are also a Te Deum, a Stabat, many concerts, marches, masses, &c. Haydn made a new epoch in instrumental music. Inexhaustible in invention and execution, always new and original, always surprising and satisfying the hearer, he ruled the taste of the age. His symphonies have all these characteristics. From him the quartetts first obtained a spirit and an artful involution, which enraptured connoisseurs. Some years before his death, which happened May 31, 1809, the Dilettanti Society in Vienna concluded their winter concerts with a splendid performance of the Creation, to which Haydn was invited. His reception made a great impression on him, weakened as he was by age, but his own work affected him still more deeply; and, at the passage "It was light," overpowered by the harmony which he had himself created, the tears ran down his cheeks, and, with upraised arms, he cried, "Not from me, but thence does all this come!" He sunk under the weight of his feelings, and was obliged to be carried out."

The annexed brief notice will be interesting, especially to those who heard the celebrated vocalist during his visit to this country.

INCLEDON, THE VOCALIST.

"Benjamin Charles Incledon, the English vocalist, was born about 1764. When only eight years old, he was articled to Jackson of Exeter, under whose tuition he remained as a chorister in Exeter cathedral until his fifteenth year. In 1779 he entered the navy as a common sailor. His vocal abilities having attracted the notice of his officers, he was advised to try his fortune on the stage. In October, 1790, he made his debut on the London boards, at Covent-garden theatre, with great success, in the character of Dermot, in O'Keefe's musical farce of the Poor Soldier, and rose at once into a degree of popularity, which attended him till the infirmities consequent upon advancing years, and an irregular mode of life, compelled him to retire from the active duties of his profession. Of the diminution of his powers, however, he never could be persuaded, but constantly attributed his declining popularity to the caprice of the public. His voice—a rich tenor—combined uncommon power, sweetness, and ductility, both in the natural and falsetto, and his intonation was singularly correct, taking his imperfect education into consideration. His articulation was, however, far from equal to his other qualities, being coarse, not to say vulgar. The better sort of the old English ballad, of which Stevens's Storm and Gay's Black-eyed Susan are, perhaps, among the finest specimens, was decidedly his forte: in this style of singing he had no equal. Pecuniary embarrassments, arising from an utter carelessness of money and general improvidence, embittered the latter part of his life, which was closed at Worcester, February, 1826."

We sincerely trust that the enterprising publishers of this inestimable work will continue to obtain for it a ready and general circulation.

The Beauties of the British Poets, with a few introductory observations. By the Rev. George Croly. New-York: C. Wells. 12mo. 1 vol. p. 393. 1831.

This volume is of a nature calculated to be useful in this country. It may be said, that the ease with which the careless reader may thus become possessed of the beauties of an author, will abate his eagerness to peruse his whole works. But we rather suppose, that there are multitudes of persons here who love to read, and have sufficient taste to appreciate this collection of fragments, yet who could never be at all acquainted with them unless thus brought within their reach. The selections are not made altogether as we could wish. Shakespeare, Milton, Pope, Gray, Scott, Campbell, Byron, and Goldsmith might have been omitted, as already well known by all who read at all. The productions of Chaucer, Spenser, Crabbe, Southey, Coleridge, Keats, and Wolfe, are very properly introduced.

Although old Chaucer paid little attention to the smoothness, the metre, and the glitter of the thin idea, beaten out in the poetry of the present day, like gold leaf; yet some of our modern moon-gazers might read many a precious lesson in wit, wisdom, and imagination from his rough verse.

The reader unacquainted with his works will peruse this rather as a specimen of his style than of his general merit:

"With him there was his son, a fresh young squire,
A lover and a lusty bachelor,
With locks curled as they were laid in press;
Of twenty years of age he was I guess.
Of his stature he was of equal length,
And wonderfully agile, and great of strength;
And he had something seen of chivalrie,
In Flanders, in Artois, and Picardie,
And borne him well, as of little space,
In hope to stand in his lady's grace.
"Embroiled was he, as it were a meade
All full of fresh flowers, white and red,
Singing he was, or fluting all the day,
He was as fresh as is the month of May.
Short was his gown, with sleeves full long and wide,
Well could he sit on horse, and fairly ride.
He could songs make, and well endite,
Joste, and ke dance, and well portray and write.
Courteous he was, lowly and servicable,
And carved for his father at the table."

Crabbe, whom we believe Byron termed the best of the living British poets, is but slightly read in this country compared with Moore, Scott, and Campbell; and yet there is much strong, forcible picturing in the subjoined lines "on a mother's death." The reader will excuse the room they occupy.

"Then died lamented, in the strength of life,
A valued mother and a faithful wife;
Called not away, when time had loosed each hold
On the fond heart, and each desire grew cold;
But when to all that knit us to our kind,
She felt fast bound, as charity can bind,—
Not when the ill of age, its pain, its care,
The drooping spirit for its fate prepare;
And each affection failing, leaves the heart
Loosed from life's charm, and willing to depart;
But all her ties the strong invader broke,
In all their strength, by one tremendous stroke:
Sudden and swift the eager pest came on,
And terror grew till every hope was gone:
Still those around appeared for hope to seek!
But viewed the sick and were afraid to speak.
"Slowly they bore, with solemn step, the dead:
When grief grew loud and bitter tears were shed:
My part began; a crowd drew near the place,
Awe in each eye; alarm in every face:
So swift the ill, and of so fierce a kind,
That fear with pity mingled in each mind;
Friends with the husband came their griefs to blend;
For good-man Frankford was to all a friend.
The last-born boy they held above the bride,
He knew not grief, but cries expressed his fear;
Each different age and sex revealed its pain,
In now a louder, now a lower strain;
While the neck father listening to their tones,
Swelled the full cadence of the grief by groans.
The elder sister strove her pangs to hide,
And soothing words to soothe her mind applied;
"Be patient, patient, be patient, be patient;
But failed as oft, and weeping turned away.
"Curious and sad upon the fresh-dug hill,
The village lads stood melancholy still;
And idle children wandering to and fro;
As nature guided, took the tone of woe.
"Arrived at home, how then they gazed around,
In every place—where she no more was found;
The seat at table she was wont to fill;
The fire-side chair, still set, but vacant still;
The garden-walks, a labor all her own;
The lattice bower with trailing shrubs o'ergrown;
The Sunday pew she filled with all her race;
Each place of hers was now a sacred place,
That while it called up sorrows in the eyes,
Pierced the full heart and forced them still to rise."

Journal of a Cruise of the United States Schooner Dolphin among the Islands of the Pacific Ocean; and a Visit to the Mulgrave Islands, in pursuit of the Mutineers of the whale ship Globe. With a map. By Lieutenant Hiram Paulding, of the United States Navy. New-York: G. & C. & H. Carvill. p. 258. 12mo. 1831.

Among the phenomena of the present day may be reckoned the publication of a little book, which, in as few words as possible, communicates all the writer has to say and no more. Such is the work before us, which records the particulars of "a cruise of upwards of eleven months in an unfrequented ocean," in the compass of two hundred and fifty-eight pages of small duodecimo. Assuredly Lieutenant Paulding knows nothing of the art of book-making, or with the materials before him, he might with perfect convenience to himself, if not to his readers, have manufactured two respectable octavos at least.

We cannot but confess, however, that we are rather pleased with the outrage committed by our young author on the fashion of the times, not being able to comprehend very distinctly the propriety of making the public pay for size instead of substance, and purchase its corn, chaff and all. We are inclined to say of brevity, that it is the soul of knowledge as well as wit; and have often been tempted to compare a great book, made after the present most approved fashion, to a great house, only one or two rooms of which are furnished and occupied.

Lieutenant Paulding is indeed deplorably deficient in that talent which has been supposed to be characteristic of sailors, to wit, of "spinning long yarns." He proceeds, after a brief exposition of the object of the Dolphin's cruise, to a detail of the occurrences which took place, with a clearness and simplicity of style which is equally applicable to the subject, and equally indicative of good taste as well as good sense. To see a sailor bold, throwing about earthquakes, tides, and volcanoes; speculating on the Wernerian and Huttonian systems, and giving long Latin names to the most innocent plants growing on unfrequented isles, where never botanist set his foot, to our minds furnishes pretty conclusive evidence that he has had frequent intercourse with the Encyclopedia, or that he has employed some eminent professor of common place, to sprinkle his work with a profusion of the withered flowers of hacknied science.

The author has, we think, very properly avoided all this, describing only what he sees, and leaving it to others to draw their own conclusions from the facts he furnishes. His account of the Mulgrave Islands is to us particularly interesting. They appear to be the very latest formation of the earth, and their inhabitants to approach nearer to the simplicity of a state of nature, than any other people we have seen described. If so, one might be apt to believe the eulogiums of sentimentalists on nature and simplicity are not very well founded. They seem to have been both treacherous and revengeful; and, in the art of thieving, equal to any of Paul Clifford's worthy associates. This propensity to the agrarian system of property, is, however, characteristic of all people approaching to a state of nature, and originates partly in their confused notions of meum and tuum, partly in the absence of definite laws securing property, and definite punishments for violating them.

The sketch which Lieutenant Paulding gives us, of the manners and habits of the natives of Oahoo, who are said to have been converted, is not calculated to sanction any very exalted ideas of the benefits derived from the zealous and persevering exertions of the missionaries in that quarter. Experience, indeed, has every where demonstrated that the christian religion is the religion of civilized men. Neither barbarians nor savages can comprehend its sublime precepts; its morality, its forbearance, its mercy, or its justice. When savages become agriculturists; when they learn to practise the arts of civilization, and all the relations of social life grow familiar to them, the seed now sown may take root and flourish. Time and patience, zeal and perseverance, piety and enthusiasm, every day work miracles; and let us wait to see what these will perform among the savages of the Pacific. The experiment is worth attention; let it have a fair trial. Rome was not built in a day; neither can the ancient habits of men, their cherished superstitions, and their inheritance of ignorance, be dissipated so easily as some imagine.

The perusal of this work has afforded us particular gratification. The author is evidently no practised writer, yet his style is, with a very few exceptions, clear, brief, and applicable to the subject. He neither deals in sentimental flights, nor tiresome declamation, nor inflated descriptions of perils by sea or land. In short, all is natural and unaffected. As such we heartily recommend it to our readers—as a little book—a cheap book, and a highly amusing as well as interesting book. We understand the author is the oldest son of the late John Paulding, one of the captors of Major Andre.

Life of Mary, Queen of Scots. By Henry Glassford Bell, esq. In two volumes. Constituting Nos. XXI. and XXII. of Harper's Family Library. 12mo. pp. 276-275. 1831.

The innocence of the beautiful Scottish queen is more easy to wish than to prove. We deem him a bold man, at this day, who touches upon it any more than upon the everlasting Junius question. Mr. Henry Bell, the author of the present life, commences, as he informs the reader in a somewhat lengthy preface, with the usual "conscientious desire to disseminate truth;" and, as the first evidence, sweeps off all his predecessors by the wholesale, to make way for himself. He disclaims "the insipidity of neutrality, and the bigotry of party zeal." For his equivocal compliments to Dr. Robertson, the accomplished author of the History of Scotland, we have a most provoking propensity to give Mr. Henry Bell's two octo-decimos the benefit of a very particular dissection, but other avocations prevent our doing so at present, and we therefore suffer him to escape, with this only remark, that he who sets out by sneering at such a writer as Robertson, must, at least in his own opinion, have composed a very readable book.

Fragments of Voyages and Travels Including anecdotes of a Naval Life: chiefly for the use of young persons. By Captain Basil Hall, R.N. F.R.S. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 2 vols. pp. 247-235. 1831.

This is really an amusing production, which will be read with interest by all, but especially by those accustomed to the sea. The author appears to more advantage on his own element than on land. We had, however, noticed the "Fragments of Voyages and Travels" several weeks ago, and before it was reprinted by these intelligent and enterprising publishers. It appears in a neat form, and at a moderate price.

An Atlas of Ancient Geography. By Samuel Butler, D.D. Author of Modern and Ancient Geography for the use of Schools. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1 vol. 8vo. Stereotype edition. 1831.

From the same teeming press we have also received this valuable and elegant octavo. It contains twenty-one coloured maps with a copious index. Students of ancient history will find this atlas a desirable addition to their libraries.

Melodies, Duets, Trios, Songs, and Ballads, Pastoral, Amatory, Sentimental, Patriotic, Religious, and Miscellaneous. Together with Metrical Epistles, Tales, and Recitations. By Samuel Woodworth. Third edition. Comprising many late productions, never before published. 1 vol. 18mo. p. 288. New-York: Elliot & Palmer. 1831.

All our readers know Mr. Woodworth, or are at least acquainted with his poetry. They need not, therefore, be told that he has written numerous verses far above mediocrity, with several pieces altogether unequalled on this side the water, and perhaps unsurpassed any where. His Bucket and Watermelon are exquisite. No one reads them without getting thirsty and hungry. We are sincerely gratified at the success of the volume, and hope that this will not be, as the auctioneers say, "the third and last" edition. It is as sketchy and readable as any one could wish, and we expect that everybody born between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico, will buy it as a matter of course.

The Boston School Atlas. With Elementary Geography and Astronomy. Boston: Lincoln & Edwards. 1831.

This neatly printed and useful work is intended to obviate the necessity of placing larger and more expensive volumes in the hands of the young scholar. It comprises both map and book, and has already passed through three editions.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Fraud in lotteries.—In the American Argus of the fifteenth instant, Mr. Canfield publishes an account which tends to prove that there is a fraud practised upon the community in the permutation, as distinguished from the combination, lotteries. He declares the former to be unfair, inasmuch as it is capable of a secret arrangement, by which the adventurer who purchases a ticket with the idea that there are six large prizes to be drawn, in reality stands a chance for only one. The calculation of Mr. Canfield is very elaborate and complicated, and such as might involve a system of swindling very difficult to be comprehended, far less discovered. As it is an affair in which many are interested, we deem this notice a matter of duty. Society cannot be too much on their guard against impositions in every concern of a pecuniary nature. We shall watch the effects of this development, and, if necessary, resume the subject hereafter. We must add, however, that we are unacquainted with the character of the persons whom the substantiation of Mr. Canfield's statement will brand as dishonest speculators on the confidence and credulity of their fellow-citizens.

Dogs and fire-crackers.—These are abominable nuisances. The dogs should certainly be taxed, and the owners compelled to keep them confined; but the sudden law of the corporation is barbarous. We concede that all the canine race had better be killed, than one human being tortured with the most awful of diseases. Yet a medium course might have been adopted—something between the savageness of indiscriminate slaughter, and Alderman Hall's plan of exempting his own ward from any tax at all, a proposition which smacks strongly of what people call "taking care of number one." The decree has however gone forth, and many an honest and affectionate creature has paid the forfeit. The next object of legislation is the mischievous practice of firing crackers. They are flung in entries, at horses, and passengers. Several distressing accidents occurred last year, in consequence thereof. Eyes were put out, and horses frightened so as to throw their riders. We recommend the corporation to come out boldly, and have all the little boys killed—a dollar a head. We warrant there are plenty in the city who would be pleased with the opportunity to make even a small sum of money honestly, and there's nothing like energy in legislation.

The Albion.—The best evidence that this paper has been conducted with ability and moderation, is that it has been published in this city nine years. It frequently contains original articles, marked at once by temperate opinions on the events passing in Europe, and the most uniform courtesy towards the United States, and is at the same time avowedly a reprint of foreign journals, and distinguished by the number and quality of its selections. We have, from its commencement, read it with both attention and interest, and have always considered it a most invaluable compendium of European literature, news, and politics. The annexed paragraph, which we copy with much pleasure, is from the last number:

"The promised enlargement of this journal was carried into effect last week, with the commencement of the tenth volume. The increase is not very palpable, for being made equally on every page, only one-eighth part meets the eye, but the actual gain is fully equivalent to one entire page. This is the second time we have augmented the dimensions of our sheet, besides giving up the greater part of the page allotted to advertisements, as stipulated in the original prospectus. By these several arrangements we now present our readers with nearly half as much more reading matter as formerly, and, as no additional price is charged, we trust the public will see in these increased exertions and expenditure, a substantial proof of our determination to render ourselves worthy of the extensive and increasing patronage which is daily pouring in upon us from almost every portion of the western world."

We are gratified to hear of this, as it affords convincing evidence that a good public journal in this community will never fail to receive the support it merits; and so long as the Albion preserves its present standing, and friendly feeling towards this country and its institutions, we wish it all manner of success. We conclude by quoting the termination of the editor's remarks on the subject of the contemplated improvements:

"Before we take leave of our readers, we have yet to say, that should we be able to mature some other plans we have in view, or hereafter feel it necessary, in order fully to embody a complete and comprehensive view of the stupendous events now apparently unfolding themselves in the eastern hemisphere—we shall not hesitate again to incur a similar pecuniary sacrifice, by once more increasing the size of our journal without advancing the terms. Our ruling principle is,—and we shall follow it up without regard to any subordinate considerations,—to render this paper, what it purports to be, a full and faithful mirror of the news, politics, and literature of Europe, more particularly that of England."

Writing a play.—Among the perplexities, which, seen in the perspective, frighten many a sprightly writer from this undertaking, the following, from the "Dramatic Annual," are not among the least: "When a man attempts to write a five-act comedy, his first difficulty consists in pleasing himself; his second in pleasing the manager; his third in pleasing the actors; his fourth in pleasing the audience; his fifth in pleasing the newspapers; and, in addition to all these, the actors must please not to be taken ill; the weather must please not to be unfavorable; the opposing theatre must please not to put up strong bills; and then—what then? what then, 'please to pay the bearer the small sum of—' N. B. The sun is sometimes, per accident, not paid at all."

Piano forte.—A knowledge of this instrument is such a graceful and agreeable branch of female education, that we are pleased to observe the attention with which it is pursued. We have lately witnessed the efforts of a lady, whose taste and brilliancy of execution award her a place among the best performers. We trust there is no impropriety in mentioning the name of Miss Poole, as she comes before the public as a teacher, in which capacity she has strong claims upon their notice. Few are so competent to afford the greatest advantages to learners in the art, the study of which she has for many years prosecuted in England, under the best masters.

Boston City Guards.—The courtesy with which the common council welcomed these gentlemen from our Athenian sister city, is equally honorable to themselves, and gratifying to the inhabitants. Their short stay here prevented various expressions of friendly sentiments which were about to be extended towards them. They were to have been conducted, by an United States officer, on an excursion to view the bay, with its forts, &c., and also the establishments of Bellevue, Blackwell's Island, and, in the evening, to an entertainment at Niblo's garden; but, in consequence of their early departure, these, and other marks of good feeling were confined to a suitable appropriation, a visit to the theatre, and collation. They are a finely disciplined corps, with a superior band. On Wednesday they paraded in the Park before crowds of our fellow-citizens, and on the same afternoon, left the city, accompanied by the good wishes of all.

Trinkets.—The custom, formerly so prevalent, of presenting young children with gifts consisting of mere useless trinkets, is now very properly superseded by that of awarding to them pretty and instructive volumes, compiled and written expressly for their use. The present practice is, perhaps, induced by the number of juvenile works recently written with both care and taste. Among others we have seen a miniature edition for the hands of little masters and misses, entitled, "Gems of Sacred Poetry," published by Sleight, at Clinton-hall. It is bound in a fanciful manner, and contains a frontispiece and another engraving.

SWEET GUITAR!

A POPULAR BALLAD—COMPOSED BY JOHN BARNETT.

Andantino con moto.

Sweet gui - tar, thy wild notes cheer me; Let me wake thy dear - est lay; Sweet gui - tar, thy wild notes cheer me; Let me wake thy dear - est lay. Sweet gui - tar, sweet gui - tar, Sweet gui - tar, whilst thou art near me, My griefs are all be - gull'd a - way; Sweet gui -

SECOND VERSE.

Let my fingers once more press thee,
 Calling forth thy tend'rest song,
 Sweet guitar;
 Then my voice shall mingling bless thee,
 As its murmurs sigh along,
 Sweet guitar,

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

CONVENTION OF THE LITERATI IN NEW-YORK.—The late convention of the literati, where so much was said and nothing done, reminds me of a story of Casaubon, related, I think, by Menage. This great scholar, being shown the hall of the Sorbonne, and told that disputations had been carried on there for four hundred years, answered with great simplicity, "Well, and what have you determined?"

A friend of mine wrote the following report of the proceedings of this convention:

Question. What did you meet for?

Answer. I don't know.

Q. What did you talk about?

A. Everything.

Q. What did you do?

A. Nothing.

THE ATHENIAN STAGE.—Such was the licence of the Athenian stage, that at one period the names of the persons intended to be satirized were announced to the audience as part of the dramatis personae. It is said Socrates was often present at the play of Aristophanes, in which he is so unmercifully lampooned. This practice being forbidden by the laws, the comedians used masks, which accurately represented the faces of those intended to be ridiculed. This also was prohibited. Comedy afterwards became more decorous, as may be seen in the plays of Menander, but it lost much of its wit and vivacity.

A USURER.—Monsieur Menage says of M. L., a famous usurer of Paris, that when on his death-bed his confessor presented a silver crucifix to him with a view to awaken him to a sense of his situation, the dying miser, after examining the cross with the most minute attention, suddenly exclaimed—"Sir, I can lend you but a very small sum on such a pledge."

EXCLUDING AND INCLUDING.—A wag one day asked his friend, "How many knaves do you suppose are in this street besides yourself?" "Besides myself," replied the other, in a heat, "do you mean to insult me?" "Well, then," said the first, "how many do you reckon, including yourself?"

PHYSIOGNOMY.—It is related of Michael Angelo that he exclaimed on seeing the statue of St. Mark, at Florence, "If that statue really resembles St. Mark, I would believe every word of his writings on the credit of his physiognomy."

DIFFERENT MODES OF WEARING HATS.—A man, who had fretted himself into ill health by his anxiety for a cardinal's hat, once asked his friend how he managed to enjoy such excellent health, while he himself was always a valetudinarian? "I he reason is," replied the other, "that you have your hat always in your head, and I have my head always in my hat." B.

POSTHUMOUS POETRY.

THE enclosed lines, which have never before appeared in print, are as interesting from the character and appearance of the gifted and unfortunate writer, as from their intrinsic merit. They were composed about eleven years ago by a young girl of nineteen, whose mind was as powerful as her person was beautiful, and her manners peculiar and fascinating. Her name, which I am not at liberty to mention, would call up warm associations in the hearts of many who knew and prized her. Yet, although naturally endowed with a highly poetic imagination, she shrunk from any exhibition of her power, as if afraid "to lend her thoughts to meaner beings." I was at that period, as you will readily conceive, something younger than at present. Whether my inexperience induced me to regard the symmetry of her person, and the strange loveliness of her countenance, with an admiration rather too sincere; or whether she was in reality one of the most perfect creatures ever fashioned by nature, I cannot at this remote time precisely determine; but one of the most durable and vivid pictures in my memory presents her face lighted up with an expression which sometimes passed over it in conversation, and which caused me often while gazing upon it, to entirely forget what she was saying. She had two sisters very much like herself, and in early youth, I knew them all intimately. I need not describe the horror with which I beheld them, one after the other, wither away in the midst of their bloom and beauty, under the influence of consumption. First, the eldest drooped and faded; day after day we heard she was better and then worse; and I followed with a sick and trembling heart through all the vicissitudes of that delusive and fatal disease, till at length they told me she was dead. Though by no means of a romantic disposition, I have found myself sometimes in the shadow of the evening, or at the early dawn of a summer's day, bending over her grave, and gazing on the dewy fresh wild flowers, which have sprung up from the grass, almost as I used to gaze on her.

A few years wrought a change in the other, the next in years, and her whose voice I had listened to in the melody of the song—whose form I had watched as it attracted all eyes in the dazzle and merriment of the midnight revel—her, too, I saw borne along mournfully, and laid in the earth in peace.

The writer of these lines was the youngest and the last. She was retired and diffident, sensitive in the extreme, and less fitted for the world than either of the others; yet she remained in it longer. They both loved its pleasures, and recoiled from death; but no bird escaped from its cage ever flew to the wild woods with more eagerness than she laid down upon the bed from which she knew she should rise no more.

The only relic which I obtained of her is the enclosed in her own hand-writing. I have copied it for the Mirror. Her retired habits led her into a severe course of reading, on a portion of which, as the preface note will show, these lines were founded.

SEDLEY.

SLEEP.

[The following address to Sleep is a version of such parts of Memoir, v. Part 2, Sec. 2, of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, as seemed to the writer fit for versification. Other ideas are introduced, probably not more original.]

Since too much waking hurts, O, gentle Sleep!
Even against thy will thou must be woo'd,
And forced the restless soul entranced to keep,
Till we o'ercome the deadly waking mood.
Sweet influence! yea, thou must be forced to sleep
In bland oblivion thoughts that are not good
For entertainment—since they bring us pain,
And, without thee, will craze the fevered brain.
Shalt thou, on Alpine heights, in polar cold,
The bloodless dormouse and the sullen bear
In one long night of no unrest enfold,
In frozen curtains that admit no care;
While man, as lord of breathing things, enrolled
In God's own ordered writ, shall have no share
Of solace, which his nature needs must claim,
Both for the mind o'erwrought and wearied frame?
Thou old poets, in immortal lays,
Adored as universal nature's rest—
Peace of the soul, whose influence care obeys,
Sore care who listens to no other host;
As still restoring, after anxious days,
The limbs and faculties with toil oppress—
Reftling man his daily race to run
Of toil, beneath the ever-travelling sun.

Thy charm the skillful as supreme confess
Above all alchemy and magic spells:
Of different modes to win thy bland caress,
The antique leech in lore black-lettered tells.
But when grim night-mare griefs the soul oppress,
Not his the craft thy presence that compels;
Dark Melancholy's patient cannot find
In foolish physis, slumber for the mind.
Nor unto him luxurious rest deny
Through a whole third of earth's diurnal phases;
But, half-asleep in reverie to lie
While light's original fountain streams and blazes,
And nature works beneath the laughing sky,
Doating, on fond conceits, in dreamy mazes,
Sinks him below all God's own quick creations,
Nor will one muse inspire his meditations
For that sweet moistening sleep must fall on men
As heaven's own dew in palpable and fine,
And unperceived, till cool, clear morning, when
On every blade and leaf imperceptible shine.
So he who well has slept, new hopes again
Flinds fresh and sparkling; and the good divine,
Which we call reason, prompts him through the day
To struggle with his fortune as he may.
Oh sage philosophy! teach us how to slumber,
When the intractable brain is hot or dry,
With all the pangs and fears we cannot number,
And all the hopes that blossom, fade, and die;
With the great businesses our thoughts that cumber,
Whereat the angels laugh—with reason why!
When all that thou canst teach us, thou hast taught,
Oh sage philosophy! thy lore is naught!

Hark! the loud thunder roars—thine enemy,
Sleep, even when thou art kind; and thro' the shutters
The lurid lightning sheds its blazour;
But I am not alarmed, though the storm utters
Its threatenings; for I am at peace with thee,
My conscience. Is it so? stern conscience mutters—
I do fear God. And yet I cannot keep Mine even reckoning with thee, oh sleep!

Sleep! let the wretch who waits and dreads to-morrow,
Lose but one little gap of hurrying time!
Revive the dead, to soothe his heart's dear sorrow,
Or steep in Lethe unforgotten crime!
Or teach the flagging frame at least to borrow
Some little strength before the matin prime!
Vainly invoked, oh sleep! thou canst not give Relief to those who, fearing evil, live.

Not to the clown, who for his rent unpaid
Must on to-morrow leave his low-rotted cot;
Not to the king, who for his sceptre awayed
Unwisely, waits a battle to be fought;
Him only canst thou with thy influence aid
Who, sentenced, for all earth cares not a jot—
Condemned to die in the morning—who has past
The bitterness of death, before life's last.

For he sleeps soundly, when he hath no need
Of thee, against that morrow's setting sun,
For whom irrevocably 'tis decreed
His business in this tedious world is done;
Whose hope is dead, whose fear is past remedied,
And whose eternity has now begun.
No dreams disturb his slumbers who must wake
To meet the axe, the gibbet, or the stake.

Night Interrogate thee, thou, who art
Death's younger brother, and his counterfeit,
Pain would I ask thee, if, when we depart
From heaven's clear presence, and in darkness meet
The worms for our companions, in their mart
Of human food—shall visions foul or sweet
Visit our slumbers, ere the trumpet's peal
Shall summon us to endless weal or woe!

If ere the soul puts its old vesture on,
Transformed to raptures or to burning weeds,
It shall do homage at the eternal throne,
Or penance in dread Hades for its deeds?
Ah, could thine oracle the truth make known
From those dark halls whence never voice proceeds,
It were in vain, dull god, to question thee,
What portion hast thou of eternity?

For in the grave, whether our dreams be fraught
With amaranths, harpings, and sweet gales of heaven,
Or demon-haunted, is to us as naught,
Who are imbued with the immortal leaven.
Time is not, if we lie devoid of thought;
And if the sure expectancy be given,
Whether we wake to glory or to shame,
'Twill, at the resurrection, be the same.

DOGS.

The scenes of coarse and brutal cruelty which have been, during several days, acted in this city, are as disagreeable to the civilized portion of the citizens, as injurious to the morals of the younger part of the community. It is astonishing what a deal of slang and hypocrisy there is yet in the world, notwithstanding the establishment of periodical papers and societies for the promotion of virtue. Now, the gentlemen of the common council make formidable speeches touching the immorality of permitting the people to erect booths on the fourth of July, while they themselves indulge freely in all sorts of agreeable beverages within the hall, yet behold them, from mere indolence, instead of drawing up a law by which the evil may be remedied without violating the feelings of society, behold them decreeing the indiscriminate butchery of hundreds of those poor creatures, dogs, in the broad daylight, in the public streets, and by boys, negroes, and all the "list of landless resolute," who are pleased with an opportunity to gratify the natural ferocity of their disposition with impunity. I am told that a thousand dollars have been already paid, in sums of one dollar to each reprobate, who has thus indulged at once his avaricious and his sanguinary propensities. There are many ways of securing the safety of the citizens by less objectionable means. They might have declared it a misdemeanor, with the penalty of fine and imprisonment, for any person to have kept a dog within the city, after a certain period; and those animals, running astray, should have been removed, and, if necessary, destroyed by proper persons, and in a proper manner. By the way, Messrs. Editors, is it a fable that one of your editorial corps took a personal share in this refined business, and put an end to the existence of some poor "Tray" in the streets? It argues a strange taste; for, however necessary many might deem the dog-law, there is surely no just reason for a gentleman, and a moral man, to set such an example to his children.—But it is not my design, at present, to expatiate upon conduct which is already sufficiently obvious in its character, but to lay before you the following lines, with a brief account of the manner in which they came into my possession.

I am a very early riser, and walk abroad every pleasant morning alone, sometimes upon the Battery, and at others out of town. For several weeks I had chosen the latter course as the scene of my rambles, having been especially delighted with a lovely and picturesque view from the banks of the North River. A narrow, winding lane, luxuriantly clothed with a variety of blossoming shrubbery, and occasionally overshadowed with tall trees, leads to the spot; and here I was wont to roam, refreshed with the quiet scented morning air.

One day I was peculiarly struck with the appearance of a large dog, black as the raven, and of a fine form: his head was such as sometimes looks down on you from the silent study of the painter: his body was covered with a profusion of glossy black curls. He evidently appertained to that noble race designated by Burns—

"Whelpit in some place, far abroad,
Where sailors gang to fish for cod."

By his side was a graceful spaniel of light brown, with which he seemed to be on excellent terms. They chased each other around in circles, and played a thousand capricious and merry pranks together, much to my amusement. This was repeated for several mornings, until the other day I missed them. After whistling several times, I at length observed the spaniel alone. He had been stretched out on the grass—(dead? no, gentle reader, asleep.) He lifted his head as he heard me whistle, and gave a faint wag with his tail, but immediately stretched himself out again, and, after snapping at several flies that buzzed about his nose, with a peevish air, which evidently betrayed to the deep observer that he was laboring under some disappointed feeling, he rolled himself partly over on his back, and closed his eyes. Beside him were lying a broken ink-bottle, with a few drops remaining, and the stump of an old pen; his right paw was gently pressed upon a piece of paper, which I disentangled carefully, without awakening him: on it were scribbled these lines. I do not pretend to vouch for the authorship, but leave the sagacious reader to his own imagination. I say nothing.

TO MY MURDERED FRIEND CARLO.

Farewell, dear Carlo, with thy honest face,
Thy ears erect, thy black, luxuriant hair
Down flowing o'er thy broad and ample sides,
With raven beauty clothed, and fearless strength;
In every motion grace, in every look
Fidelity and ceaseless gratitude,
Evil befall the coward, ruffian crew
That bathed thy glossy locks in crimson gore.
Could not the butchers know thee from the curs
Who, like themselves, within the public street
Do fight for bones, and raise thy audacious howl
At those whose garments' hem they dare not touch?
Oh! bounteous nature had inspired thee
With nobler impulses than ever warm'd
Their bargain-planing breasts, or they had paused,
Moved by thine eyes that floated large and flash'd,
Less fumed for anger than unbounded love.
And the proud bearing of thy stately form,
That, like a monarch seen with meener men,
Proclaim'd thee good and noble, would have turn'd
Their unrelenting spirits from thy death.
Oh! had the slave that crushed thy graceful head
But ever met thee on the hill alone,

And raised his coward club, full soon, I ween,
His trembling flesh had known thine ivory teeth—
Weapons not like the wretched sufferer, man's,
Wrenching his jaws with shooting agony
As hungry rottenness has seized its prey
Ere death had giv'n the word, but sound as when Nature had planted them in goodly rows
Display'd, forth gleaming through thy sable jaws.

Carlo, my friend, what virtue dwells in man
That did not shine in thee! Courage was thine;
Generous and proud, with gentle meekness join'd;
Unto thine enemy and mine a tiger,
That from the darkened bush ferocious glares
Upon its shrinking victim; but to me,
Or to the master's well-remember'd voice,
Or when his pretty infant laughter flung
Her snowy, blue-vein'd arm around thy neck,
Or lean'd her light form on thy shaggy back,
Gentle thy nature as the summer bird,
Or harmless lamb that leaves its half brows'd grass,
And marks the stranger with inquiring eyes.
A blight upon the arm whose murderous aim,
Oh, slaughterer! has hush'd thy faithful voice,
Poor Carlo, and thy beating bosom still'd!

As the celebrated essay of Dr. Goldsmith upon the same subject, appears peculiarly suitable to the times, may I request that you will insert it for the benefit of the common council? He writes as follows:

"Indulgent nature seems to have exempted this island from many of those epidemic evils which are so fatal in other parts of the world. A want of rain but for a few days beyond the expected season in China, spreads famine, desolation, and terror over the whole country; the winds that blow from the brown bosom of the western desert are impregnated with death in every gale; but in this fortunate land of Britain, the inhabitants court health in every breeze, and the husbandman ever sows in joyful expectation.

"But though the nation be exempt from real evils, think not, my friend, that it is more happy on this account than others. They are afflicted, it is true, with neither famine nor pestilence; but then there is a disorder peculiar to the country which every season makes strange ravages among them; it spreads with pestilential rapidity, and infects almost every rank of people; what is still more strange, the natives have no name for this peculiar malady, though well known to foreign physicians by the appellation of epidemic terror.

"A season is never known to pass in which the people are not visited by this cruel calamity in one shape or another, seemingly different, though ever the same: one year it issues from a baker's shop in the shape of a six-penny loaf, the next it takes the appearance of a comet with a fiery tail, a third it threatens like a flat-bottomed boat, a fourth it carries consternation at the bite of a mad dog. The people, when once infected, lose their relish for happiness, saunter about with looks of despondence, ask after the calamities of the day, and receive no comfort but in heightening each other's distress. It is insignificant how remote or near, how weak or powerful the object of terror may be, when once they resolve to fright and be frightened, the merest trifles sow consternation and dismay, each proportions his fears not to the object but to the dread he discovers in the countenance of others; for when once the fermentation is begun, it goes on of itself, though the original cause be discontinued which first set it in motion.

"A dread of mad dogs is the epidemic terror which now prevails, and the whole nation is at present actually groaning under the malignity of its influence. The people sally from their houses with that circumspection which is prudent in such as expect a mad dog at every turning. The physician publishes his prescription, the beadle prepares his halber, and a few of unusual bravery arm themselves with boots and buff gloves, in order to face the enemy if he should offer to attack them. In short, the whole people stand bravely upon their defence, and seem by their present spirit to show a resolution of not being tamely bit by mad dogs any longer.

"Their manner of knowing whether a dog be mad or no, somewhat resembles the ancient European custom of trying witches. The old woman suspected was tied hand and foot, and thrown into the water. If she swam, then she was instantly carried off to be burnt for a witch; if she sunk, then indeed she was acquitted of the charge, but drowned in the experiment. In the same manner a crowd gather round a dog suspected of madness, and they begin by teasing the devoted animal on every side: if he attempts to stand upon the defensive and bite, then he is unanimously found guilty, for a mad dog always snaps at every thing; if, on the contrary, he strives to escape by running away, then he can expect no compassion, for mad dogs always run straight forward before them.

"It is pleasant enough for a neutral being like me, who have no share in these ideal calamities, to mark the stages of this national disease. The terror at first feebly enters with a disregarded story of a little dog, that had gone through a neighboring village, that was thought to be mad by several that had seen him. The next account comes, that a mastiff ran through a certain town, and had bit five geese, which immediately run mad, foamed at the bill, and died in great agonies soon after. Then comes an affecting history of a little boy bit in the leg, and gone down to be dipt in the salt water; when the people have sufficiently shuddered at that, they are next congealed with a frightful account of a man who was said lately to have died from a bite he had received some years before. This relation only prepares the way for another, still more hideous, as how the master of a family, with seven small children, were all bit by a mad lap-dog, and how the poor father first perceived the infection by calling for a draught of water, where he saw the lap-dog swimming in the cup.

"When epidemic terror is thus once excited, every morning comes loaded with some new disaster: as in stories of ghosts, each loves to hear the account, though it only serves to make him uneasy, so here each listens with eagerness, and adds to the tidings new circumstances of peculiar horror. A lady, for instance, in the country, of very weak nerves, has been frightened by the barking of a dog; and this, alas! too frequently happens. The story soon is improved and spreads, that a mad dog had frightened a lady of distinction. These circumstances begin to grow terrible before they have reached the neighboring village, and there the report is, that a lady of quality was bit by a mad mastiff. This account every moment gathers new strength, and grows more dismal as it approaches the capital, and by the time it has arrived in town the lady is described, with wild eyes, foaming mouth, running mad upon all fours, barking like a dog, biting her servants, and at last smothered between two beds by the advice of her doctors: while the mad mastiff is in the meantime ranging the whole country over, slaving at the mouth, and seeking whom he may devour.

"My landlady, a good-natured woman, but a little credulous, waked me some mornings ago before the usual hour with horror and astonishment in her looks; she desired me if I had any regard for my safety, to keep within; for a few days ago so dismal an accident had happened, as to put all the world upon their guard. A mad dog down in the country, she assured me, had bit a farmer, who soon becoming mad ran into his own yard, and bit a fine brindled cow; the cow quickly became as mad as the man, began to foam at the mouth, and raising herself up, walked about on her hind legs, sometimes barking like a dog, and sometimes attempting to talk like the farmer. Upon examining the grounds of this story, I found my landlady had it from one neighbor, who had it from another neighbor, who heard it from very good authority.

"Were most stories of this nature thoroughly examined, it would be found that numbers of such as have been said to suffer were no way injured; and that of those who have been actually bitten, not one in a hundred was bit by a mad dog. Such accounts in general, therefore, only serve to make the people miserable by false terrors; and sometimes fright the patient into actual frenzy, by creating those very symptoms they pretended to deplore.

"But even allowing three or four to die in a season of this terrible death, (and four is probably too large a concession,) yet still it is not considered, how many are preserved in their health and in their property by this devoted animal's services. The midnight robber is kept at a distance; the insidious thief is often detected; the healthful chase repairs many a worn constitution; and the poor man finds in his dog a willing assistant, eager to lessen his toil, and content with the smallest retribution.

"A dog," says one of the English poets, 'is an honest creature, and I am a friend to dogs.' Of all the beasts that graze the lawn or hunt the forest, a dog is the only animal that, leaving his fellows, attempts to cultivate the friendship of man; to man he looks in all his necessities, with a speaking eye, for assistance; exerts for him all the little service in his power with cheerfulness and pleasure; for him bears famine and fatigue with patience and resignation; no injuries can abate his fidelity, no distress induce him to forsake his benefactor: studious to please, and fearing to offend, he is still an humble steadfast dependant, and in him alone fawning is not flattery. How unkind then to torture this faithful creature, who has left the forest, to claim the protection of man; how ungrateful a return to the trusty animal for all his services!"

SPARTAN MALEDICTION.—It is stated in the Lexicon of Suidas, that it was customary for the Lacedemonians to excrete those they hated by wishing "they might build houses, buy fine clothes, and marry coquettes."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

"The more widely science is diffused, the better will the Author of all things be known, and the less will the people be tossed to and fro by the sleight of men and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive."—Lord Brougham.

We glean a few facts and observations from the foreign magazines, being compelled to pass over several articles of more interest in consequence of their length. We should be pleased if some of our learned correspondents would occasionally contribute such items of scientific intelligence as come within their notice.

Mr. Herschel remarks: "Those who admire knowledge for its own sake, ought to wish to see its elements made accessible to all, were it only that they may be the more thoroughly examined into, and more effectually developed in their consequences, and receive that ductility and plastic quality which the pressure of minds of all descriptions, constantly moulding them to their purposes, can alone bestow."

FIRE ENGINES.—As fire-engines were formerly constructed, the noise they made in traversing London streets was so great, that it was well observed,

"The firemen swear, the engines tear,
And thunder o'er the stones."

But now—what with the improvements in the form, and the application of springs to the carriage—fire-engines make so little rumbling, that they can no longer be distinguished by the sound from other vehicles. In fact, most of the engines have less rattle than many hackney-coaches.

BLOWING ROCKS.—In the granite quarries near Seringapatam, the most enormous blocks are separated from the solid rock by the following neat and simple process:—The workman having found a portion of the rock sufficiently extensive and situated near the edge of the part already quarried, lays bare the upper surface and marks on it a line in the direction of the intended separation, along which a groove is cut with a chisel about a couple of inches in depth. Above this groove a narrow line of fire is then kindled, and maintained till the rock below is thoroughly heated, immediately on which a line of men and women, each provided with a pot full of cold water, suddenly sweep off the ashes, and pour the water into the heated groove, when the rock at once splits with a clean fracture. Square blocks of six feet in the side and upwards of eighty feet in length, are sometimes detached by this method, or by another equally simple and efficacious, but not easily explained without entering into particulars of mineralogical detail.

ILLUSION.—The following are examples of the kind of illusion which the senses practise on us, or rather, which we practise on ourselves, by a misinterpretation of their evidence. The moon at its rising and setting appears much larger than when high up in the sky. This is, however, a mere erroneous judgment; for when we come to measure its diameter, so far from finding our conclusion borne out by fact, we actually find it to measure materially less. Here is eye-sight opposed to eye-sight, with the advantage of deliberate measurement. In ventriloquism we have the hearing at variance with all the other senses, and especially with the sight, which is sometimes contradicted by it in a very extraordinary and surprising manner, as when the voice is made to seem to issue from an inanimate and motionless object. If we plunge our hands, one into ice-cold water, and the other into water as hot as it can be borne, and, after letting them stay in awhile, suddenly transfer them to a vessel full of water at a blood-heat, the one will feel a sensation of heat, the other of cold. And if we cross the two first fingers of one hand, and place a pea in the fork between them, moving and rolling it about on a table, we shall (especially if we close our eyes) be fully persuaded we have two peas. If the nose be held while we are eating cinnamon, we shall perceive no difference between its flavor and that of a deal shaving.

SKATER'S VELOCIPED.—Having, about thirteen years since, made a velocipede for going on the ice, if you think the same worthy a place in your valuable publication, you will oblige me by giving it early insertion. I have found it an easy method of proceeding at a rapid rate on a smooth surface of ice, and the exercise may be kept up for three or four hours without fatigue;—indeed, when the machine is going before the wind, the impulse given by the feet may be dispensed with, the power of the wind on the back of the person seated on the machine being sufficient to send the whole forward. The person will then merely have to put his feet down at intervals, when he may have to maintain his balance. From experiments made on our canal with a machine on this construction, it was found possible to keep pace with experienced skaters, and that by any one acquainted with the ordinary method of skating. The position of the three skates forms a sufficient base for the machine to stand alone, leaving thereby little to be attended to on the part of the skater. I may as well observe that the apparatus might be neatly made for twenty or thirty shillings.—Yours, &c. J. R.

TELESCOPE.—The telescope, as it exists at present, with the improvements in its structure and execution which modern artists have effected, must assuredly be ranked among the highest and most refined productions of human art; that in which man has been able to approximate more closely to the workmanship of nature, and which has conferred upon him, if not another sense, at least an exaltation of one already possessed by him that merits almost to be regarded as a new one. Nor does it appear yet to have reached its ultimate perfection; to which, indeed, it is difficult to assign any bounds, when we take into consideration the wonderful progress which workmanship of every kind is making, and the delicacy, far superior to that of former times, with which materials may now be wrought as well as the ingenious inventions and combinations which every year is bringing forth for accomplishing the same ends by means hitherto unattempted.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

ETON COLLEGE SALT-GATHERING.

MESSRS. EDITORS—Permit me to transcribe for the Mirror, an extract from a letter which I received by the last packet from a friend in England. It will, no doubt, be interesting here, where little or nothing is known upon the subject.

It is very difficult to ascertain the origin of the singular custom of salt-gathering which still prevails among the students of Eton; but it appears to have arisen from the early times of monkish superstition, when the friars used to sell their consecrated salt for medical purposes. There are some traces of it to be found as far back as the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who, when on a visit to the college, desired to see an account of the ceremonies observed there from its foundation. In the list was an annual procession of the scholars, who, on those occasions, repeated Latin verses, and gathered money from the public for a dinner and other purposes.—Many of the old ceremonies have been altered, many entirely abolished: this has been changed from an annual into a triennial one. Eton was founded by Henry the sixth, by a charter bearing date the eleventh of October, 1440, and endowed for the maintenance of a provost, ten priests, four clerks, six choristers, twenty-five poor grammar scholars, and twenty-five poor men. It was particularly exempt (but why I never could ascertain) from spoliation in the act for the dissolution of the colleges and chantries in the reign of Edward sixth. Since that time the establishment has been considerably altered and enlarged, and now consists of a provost, vice-provost, six fellows, two schoolmasters, seven clerks or assistants, ten choristers, besides various inferior officers and servants. The clerks were bona fide ministers of the church of England, all of whom are designated in legal phrase, clerks; and so were denominated in the charter. There are two classes of students at Eton, viz.:—collegers and oppidans. The former amounting in number to seventy, are, by the rules of the establishment, compelled to wear a thick clerical gown, and to feed on mutton for dinner in the college hall at two o'clock, from one year's end to the other, except, of course, during the vacations. The sheep that supply them are of the finest kind, and nurtured upon the rich meadows that belong to the college. This singular custom called down upon this division of the students, the galling name of tug-muttons.—The name of oppidans arose from those who resided within the town, but without the precincts of the college. The collegers all sleep in one room; and a noble one it is, being sixty-five feet high, and nearly two hundred and twenty feet in length, by about forty broad. Each has his own bed, which he is compelled to forsake at six o'clock in the morning; and by seven o'clock, every vestige of somnolency is banished for the day, every bed being so constructed as to be turned up against the wall, supported by a cord or strap. The collegers, or poor grammar scholars, are alone entitled to the privileges of the charter. The head boy or captain of the scholars, may proceed from Eton to King's college, Cambridge, immediately upon a vacancy occurring among its fellows, where he becomes happy indeed at the termination of three years with a sinecure of almost three hundred pounds per annum. I am obliged to be thus minute, perhaps tedious, to explain properly the nature of the ceremony which is called montem, from a high hill in the neighborhood. The moment a resignation comes from Cambridge, the captain, that instant, quits Eton—throws aside his gown, and is no longer an Etonian; therefore, till twelve o'clock at night previous to what Tuesday, or montem day, the captain may be called away by a resignation, and be compelled to relinquish his glittering honors to the one entitled to succeed him. This night, therefore, is called montem sure night, and is thus celebrated: every tug-mutton, (I must still be permitted to continue the usual epithet,) five minutes before twelve at night, stands beside his bed with a knife in his hand, and as the fine old college clock boldly proclaims the arrival of the propitious moment, every cord is cut, and seventy beds fall simultaneously with one tremendous crash upon the oaken floor. Should a resignation arrive after that time, the captain is entitled to have the montem and his fellowship too.

On the day in question, every student above the fourth division, is compelled to wear military uniform, consisting of cocked hat and feather, red body coat, ornamented with gold lace, white kerseymere small clothes, white silk stockings and pumps, and sword upon his thigh; the remainder in blue coat, white waistcoat, white pantaloons, white stockings and shoes. The first twelve scholars are entitled to have servants selected from among the students beneath the fourth division, provided they think fit to go to the great expense their sumptuous dresses cost them. A certain number are appointed to the office of salt-bearers, whose duty it is, clad in some fanciful dress or other, to stop every vehicle and passenger of whatsoever kind, high or low, and demand salt, i. e. money. Upon their generously depositing something in his bag, he gives a ticket in exchange, in order that they may thereafter pass free from a like request.

As his late majesty was once wending his way towards the college in his private travelling carriage, with four horses and two servants behind, presenting the appearance completely of a private individual, a salt-bearer approached somewhat in a hurry, and thrusting his bag in at the window, exclaimed hastily and rudely, "Salt, be quick! Salt!" The youth was dressed fantastically as an Italian bandit; large mustachios concealed his upper lip, a cutlass hung from a scarlet belt which bound his waist, embracing a pair of highly ornamented duelling pistols, a scarlet half cloak pended from his shoulders, which with dark green tight small clothes, and high boots richly furnished with glittering spurs, formed the chief points of his dress as he sat upon his spirited and prancing steed loudly demanding the customary tribute. The inmate of the carriage, not choosing to answer this peremptory demand, sat very composedly in his seat till the youth, seeing more travellers approaching on every side, exclaimed peevishly, "Salt, salt, sir! confound you! I can't stay here all day." Here the gentleman bent forward, his countenance illumined with a smile, and said, "Sir, may not the king of England ride along his own highway without violence from robbers?" The youth instantly recognized the features of his sovereign, and blushed deeply with chagrin—perhaps with fear. "Sir," replied the astounded salt-bearer, doffing his hat with the profoundest amility, "I didn't—I—I—shouldn't—I, I didn't know—I didn't think of meeting your majesty so early in the morning—" "So, sir," resumed the king, "here's a change from the saucy overbearing bandit, to the stammering, half-frightened suppliant for forgiveness; how now, sir?" "Sir," replied the youth, "Timeo simulacra Deorum." His majesty smiled at the compliment, and said, "Your name, young man? Quo sanguine cretus?" "I answer to that of Lord Albert Conyngham," replied the salt-bearer. The king looked at him steadily for a moment, and not without emotion, and then, raising his hand to the window over which Lord Conyngham bowed. "Well, my lord, forgive and forget," and dropped a hundred guineas into his bag.

To return to my narrative. On account of the king's presence this night is rendered more splendid and interesting than it otherwise would be. The parents of the students generally attend, which brings together all the principal nobility of England, for their sons are chiefly educated at Eton. The most costly equipages and liveries are seen at an early hour hurrying on from every quarter: horses covered with foam, with panting, wide extended nostrils, and smoking flanks, bespeak no loitering gait; tandems, gigs, buggies, tilburies, stanhopcs, horsemen, carts, carriages and four, post chaises, and stage-coaches piled on high with passengers, and people of every grade, now obstruct the roads and lanes. Amidst this general bustle, the cry of "the king, the king," as he approaches, causes a general rush, and it is with no little difficulty that the guards appointed to attend his majesty keep the path clear for him. As he alights from his carriage every Etonian, man, boy, woman, and child, seem to aid in the universal shout of "God save the king! hurrah!" with three times three. At the same moment the two martial bands swell forth the grand national air. Old courtiers line the paths to pay demonstrations of loyalty to their sovereign. Upon his arrival the whole procession, in order, moves forward to Salt hill, where, upon a lofty mount, the appointed student delivers an appropriate Latin address, his own composition, and generally receives some flattering compliment from his monarch. This part of the scene is beautiful. Here the king, and such of the royal family as may be present, his nobles, and courtiers, the provosts and fellows of the college, the Etonians, α πολλα, assemble en masse around the hill, bareheaded, until the address, which is delivered from the top of the mount, is concluded. THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

MISS ALEXINA FISHER has appeared as Norval, in one act of Douglas, at the Park. She does not possess his uniform propriety and finish, but in points closely approaches the excellence of her celebrated little rival Burke. As the current of public taste runs strongly in favor of the juvenile performances, it would be a pleasure to witness the united exertions of these two youthful "representatives" in Romeo and Juliet for instance. On Monday evening the School for Scandal was played with effect. Booth, Cooper, and Hamblin afford the Bowery a decided superiority for tragedy. Jane Shore has been produced, with a strong cast: Gloucester, Booth; Hastings, Cooper; Dumont, Hamblin; Jane Shore, Mrs. Duff. It drew together a respectable audience, not at all backward in expressions of approbation. If this house can present a succession of sterling plays as ably sustained as this, its success is certain. Mr. Cooper surprised us with much of his youthful vigor, and reminded us of old times, when the sober descendants of Hard Kopping Piet were overcome with rapture on hearing Howard sing "Love's young dream"—when the critics smiled and "gave the nod" in sanction of the pas seul by Miss Dillenger, and when he who discovered the hardihood to dislike Cooper's Romeo or Othello, would have been set down as "a very good fellow, perhaps, but no great judge of theatricals." But the age is now astonishingly enlightened upon these subjects, and every whipper-snapper of twenty, smokes cigars, drinks brandy-and-water, and has more knowledge in the tip end of his little finger, as the saying is, than his father had in his whole body. Cooper has faults and glaring ones—so has Kean—but he possesses many fine requisites for acting. Mr. Booth is fiery—unequal—sometimes dull—and sometimes beautiful. He comes near the Kean school, and can always arouse and delight an audience when he pleases. Mr. Hamblin has never appeared to more advantage than he does at present. His Dumont added greatly to the interest of the play—it was animated without rant. The fencing scene with Hastings was excellent. Mrs. Duff, as Jane Shore, excited the deepest attention, and, especially in the last act, evinced unusual power.

THE DEPARTED.

Why comes he not? our own bright boy!
The glory of our hearts—
Our hope—our sunbeam—and our joy—
Our shield mid sorrow's darts!

We pine for his dear gladdening tone
As for some spell divine!
As men for founts in deserts lone,
So for his glance we pine!

Why comes he not? the pale spring flowers
In beauty round us wave—
The rose its perfumed treasure showers—
Where lingers he—our brave?

Hath pleasure, in the stranger's land,
His heart from home beguiled?
Bends he mid wealth's forgetful band?
Or hath fame lured our child?

He comes not—home no charm can boast—
Life's garden seems a wild:
A casket with the jewel lost—
We mourn to meet our child!

Cease your vain tears! ye dream of one
Whom earth may claim no more:
The dove from you forever flown,
The lamp whose ray is o'er.

Beyond the stars there shines a world
Where storms may never blast,
Where mercy's pinion ne'er is furled—
There hath the lost one pass'd!

TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. PHEBE L. BELL.

BY ESTELLE.

And thou art gone, my friend! ere youth's bright summer days were Gone to the silent tomb, and we may look on thee no more. (o'er;
That pale, still brow, is shaded now beneath the coffin lid,
And all of thee, save memory, in the cold earth lies hid.

I did not think that thou couldst die, so lovely and so young,
While health her rosy mantle o'er thy features smiling flung.
But sickness came with fatal aim, to show how vain the worth
Of human love, with which we strove to hold thee still on earth.

I have been with thee in thy hours of joyousness and glee;
Together pleasure's path we trod in careless gaiety.
Oh, how those thoughts oppress'd my heart on that last fearful day,
When late I saw thy spirit leave its tenement of clay.

Yes, thou art gone! the life, the charm of all thy little sphere:
Nor canst thou know how thou art miss'd by those who lov'd thee
Gone to thy deep, unbroken sleep, within thy narrow bed, (here,
Where flowers may bloom, with sweet perfume, above th' unconscious dead.

Rest, rest, my friend, rest on in calm and undisturb'd repose,
Rest, at peace, can feel no more life's pleasures or its woes.
Low in the tomb, thy last, long home, securely thou dost lie,
While o'er thy head the echoing tread shall pass unheeded by.

I saw the eyes unused to weep o'erflow with tears for thee;
I saw the aged kneel in prayer, the youthful shrink to see
The death-signs gathering on thy face, mysterious and strange,
Preparing all around to view the final, solemn change.

I felt the last throbs of thy pulse, met thy last look on earth,
And oh, it seem'd my heart again could never turn to mirth. [thee,
For all that's bright in this world's light, will bring back thoughts of
And every scene, where thou hast been, will whisper, "where is she?"

Yet it were better thus to fill a course so bright and brief,
Than linger on till life be like the sea'd and yellow leaf;
Bette, to leave with those who grieve, one image on the heart
Of loveliness, in youth's first dress, from time and blight apart.

Why should we mourn thy happier lot, thy shorter passage, on
To that far brighter world, where hope persuades us thou art gone?
Peace be to thee, beloved friend! regrets and tears are vain,
For here, amidst life's pleasant paths, we ne'er can meet again.

Thou canst not hear the harp which breathes this last, this sad fare-
The harp, thy partial love has prais'd in many a lighter swell. [well,
Oh, thou hast done with earthly loves! and it is left for me
To wake its chords, in heart-wrung words, but to thy memory.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No 113.

THERE is a time when the liveliest spirit is depressed. In proportion as it has been lively, its melancholy will be deep. A shadow comes over the present and future; only the past is bright. Few are so happy as to have escaped this feeling, if indeed there is any happiness in being ignorant of it; for although a person in this mood is the most desolate and lonely of created things, he is not without a kind of gratification. Individuals accustomed to sedentary and mental occupations are frequently betrayed into this despondency, and whoever has been its victim will recognize the truth and nature of an expression of John Keats a short time before his death, and which reveals at once a volume of sad forebodings: "I can already feel the flowers growing over me."

Perhaps these words of the unfortunate poet recurred to my mind with more force, from the fact that I had myself fallen into a humor of melancholy. There seemed to be no reality in life. By a strange illusion I beheld the cares and disadvantages of the present as through a microscope, which also magnified the joys of the past, while all my surrounding sources of happiness were forgotten. A dreadful distinctness of memory brought before me from their dark rest in the church-yard several whom I had loved. Their voices were in my ears; their faces glowing with life and pleasure were floating in my imagination, and at once forced upon my mind with a singular vividness the certainty of death, and inflamed me with a wish that the crisis was passed. I was thinking of the weary hours of sickness and pain which I must probably suffer before I was stretched out at length in quietness, when the Little Genius, with a right merry countenance, peeped over my shoulder and shook his finger with an arch mixture of ridicule and compassion. I felt the cheering influence of his presence, but a gloom was at my heart, and I could not force my features into a smile.

"Why, thou dull mortal," he said, "wherefore dost thou gaze on me with so much apathy? Is it even true that thou art sated with me as thou wouldst be with the best of earthly blessings? But thou knowest not the sources of thine own discontent. Thou art pining after imaginary happiness, and yielding to weak sadness for the want of adventures of pain and peril. Wherefore is the shadow on thy brow and the coldness at thy heart? Wherefore dost thou turn from beautiful things with a lonely and disappointed feeling?"

"Because I am wretched," I answered.

"And wherefore art thou wretched? Perhaps disease has racked thy joints with anguish?"

"No," I replied; "my limbs are free from the touch of pain."

"Then, perchance accident hath shut up some of thy precious senses?"

"No, my senses are all perfect as bestowed by the original hand of Nature."

"Then art thou languishing for food, raiment or shelter?"

"No," said I; "the common vulgar wants of life are not the cause of my discontent. I am brooding over the past. I am speculating on the future. I am bewildered amid conjectures of what I am and what I shall be. I am gloomy over the graves of mouldering friends. I am weary with the tedium and stale monotony of life. It is a burthen to me of which I am tired; why should I not desire relief?"

"Wouldst thou be cured of this melancholy?"

"It is incurable," said I; "because I am convinced that the accomplishment of all my schemes would only afford me a temporary pleasure. If thou wert to bestow upon me whatever treasure my fancy could desire, after the first surprise had faded, my spirit would relapse into a contempt for and distrust in man—a disgust at life—a scorn for its idle evanescence and exhausting raptures—horror of its benumbing and degrading agonies, and a desire for that unbroken quiet found only in the grave."

"An I do not cure thee before yonder sun shall sink, then am I for a Genius as impotent, as thou, for a mortal art dull, weak, and inexperienced."

"Impossible," said I, gazing with a melancholy glance at the radiant and expanded orb, whose rim already touched the horizon, and flooded half the heavens with a fading splendor. "I have worn out the sources of human rapture. I have tested the frailty of affection—the selfishness of friendship. I have seen the vanity of wealth and the worthlessness of fame. I have marked ignorance, hypocrisy, and bigotry move the springs which direct the course of society; while genius, virtue, and science labored in obscure poverty, or died in despair, neglect, or crime. I have thrilled over the premature wreck of youth, innocence, and beauty, and beheld it laid cold and unconscious, to moulder in the earth; while affectation, heartlessness, and wickedness move and triumph in the glare of fashion and the luxury of joy. This is not a world for me. The sun hastens down the west. See his level beams are streaming already like a reluctant farewell; would it were a last farewell to me. Genius, thou hast promised more than thou canst perform."

He shook his head at me as I spoke, and then suddenly vanished. I awoke as from a sleep, but not in my native country. In a moment the truth broke upon my mind. In a fit of despondency I had shipped as a sailor on board a merchantman, and was now traversing the southern Atlantic Ocean. The Genius, the well-remembered scenes of my native city, the crimson setting sun and tranquil summer heavens, were no more around me. Alas! I had been dreaming; and although I remembered words of care and trouble, yet it was a dream so delicious that I cursed the rough grasp which broke the spell. A dreadful storm had arisen suddenly. The sky was black. The ship was tossed fearfully on mountain-waves. We toiled, till, spent with exertion, I sunk overpowered on the deck. "Lash the lazy scoundrel till he lays hold," said a voice coarse as the tempest, and blow succeeded blow upon my body. A thundering billow broke over the deck, and the cry resounded, "a man overboard!" The outstretched hands and sinking head were visible but a moment in the boiling foam, and the broken ship mounted in the air and sunk again into a black chasm. * * * * * There was a vision in my mind—of green meadows, and the bliss of standing on the firm, safe earth; no matter how poor and friendless: then—I remember no more.

Again, I was a slave on the African desert, driven naked by wandering Arabs over burning sands and pointed flints. Sometimes the torrid sun scorched my wasted flesh. Sometimes the cold night-dews covered my chilled and trembling body with smarting pains; and a brutal tyrant beat me when I lingered behind. "Oh," said I, "for one drop of water to moisten my stiff, parched throat." My master's countenance glared upon me as I spoke, like that of a ferocious wild beast; and uttering an imprecation in a strange tongue, he beat me again. "I wish I were once more in the storm-tossed vessel," thought I.

My oppressors bore me away into some unknown country, and, wherefore I knew not, confined me in a dungeon. A brutal wretch dragged me to its door, where an abyss of a depth which my eye could not fathom, gaped frightful. A flight of antique steps led downward, and a noisome and damp air ascended. My keeper thrust me down, and left me in complete darkness. My soul sunk within me. Day after day I pined here in continual midnight. An invisible hand supplied me, at long intervals, with brackish water and a kind of nutritious root, barely sufficient to sustain life. What time I remained I know not; but it seemed to me life grew more valuable in proportion as it was stripped of its blessings. One day, after my scanty meal, which I had finished with a kind of delight corresponding to my previous thirst and famished hunger, I sat down on the damp earth and reasoned about myself—"Oh, that I could but hear the voice of a friend—that would be too great a bliss. Could I but catch the tone of any human being, nay, of any being whatever, I should be satisfied: a dog to caress would make me happy, or a ray of light." As I raised my eyes, I trembled with inconceivable rapture as a faint glimmer at a distance attracted my notice. I crawled towards it: it grew brighter and brighter. By some unaccountable accident a passage had been left open and unguarded, and at length I reached a spot whence the sky, with its moon and stars, draped with a few silvery clouds, spread over the world.

Oh ye, who, night after night, roam in health and freedom beneath this magnificent dome of nature, and regard its unutterable beauty and grandeur with careless and ungrateful eyes, how shall I make you comprehend my raptures! I stretched out my hands and blessed the spotted moon as she poured her silver flood upon the silent scene. Tears, long strangers to my eyes, dropped upon the ground, while, seizing the trunk of a date-tree as the nearest thing of the living world, I covered its senseless bark with kisses.

Suddenly the dark and crumbling ruin, wherein I had long been buried, faded away; the paleness of the moonlight changed to a faint crimson; the date-tree withdrew itself from my embraces, and said,

"Look out upon the west, master student." The orb of day shot forth a sparkling beam and disappeared, and the refreshing evening breeze blew in at the window of my little apartment, and cooled the dampness which had gathered on my brow. "The sun hath set," said my instructor; "ere it resumes its journey in the east, teach thyself to acknowledge, and never to forget, the sweetness of life, and the absurdity of undervaluing it. Thy errors have been engendered by solitude and inaction, which corrupt thy fancy till it resembles the stagnant pool. Thou hast but now thrilled with the most exquisite joy at beholding a ray of light. I leave thee beneath the broad heaven, which is even now disclosing its flashing treasures. Farewell, sir student, thou canst read their lesson at thy leisure." F.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

DR. CHANNING.

WHEN we notice the universal approbation with which meritorious literary productions of a fanciful character are received by the public, we are somewhat surprised at the silence with which the works of this eloquent writer have been lunched from the press. It is not that his striking superiority is not acknowledged by all those who have listened to his discourses, or perused his compositions; for both here and in Great Britain, and, we believe, more particularly in the latter country, he is named by learned scholars and distinguished men, as one deserving a high rank among the most gifted of any age. But the mixed classes of his own countrymen are not familiarly acquainted with his singular powers, and while the public press is the vehicle of every bloody fiction, or romantic and idle legend, manufactured by foreign scribblers, to suit the prevalent depraved taste of the times, the essays of Dr. Channing are rarely conveyed by the same medium, through its innumerable channels, into the presence of the mass of the people. It may be as well for us here to state, that however eager we are to adapt our journal to the taste of the higher, and more enlightened circles of society, and however gratified we are by their approbation, we sometimes presume upon their indulgence so far as to address ourselves to the body of our countrymen. We are pleased with the opportunity of being instrumental in awakening a new thought, or improving upon a natural feeling, in the crowds of the honest and intelligent, beyond the reach of the many pleasures and advantages which appertain, more especially, to populous and thriving cities. We, therefore, sometimes purposely fill a page with matter which, to those in our immediate vicinity, may be familiar, but which will strike the inhabitants of distant villages as beautiful and new. It is from this consideration that we lay before our readers, in the present impression, a few extracts from an essay by Dr. Channing, both as a subject which possesses interest for all, and as a method of assuring the large class who, in this, as in every other community, are unwilling to encounter the works of a logical and pious writer, that those of our author will delight the taste, as surely as they will touch the heart and improve the understanding.

Several large volumes from the same pen have been recently published, which we have felt inclined to review; but, without any affectation of reverence for intellectual greatness, we shrink, almost as instinctively from offering our humble strictures upon such a monument of thought and talent, as of supposing that the hackneyed and unmeaning terms of praise, which the modern, and prevailing style of reviewing has exhausted upon every worthless ephemera, would not be out of place and almost impertinent when applied to these admirable writings. The essay, from which the observations below are extracted, is entitled "Remarks on the Character of Napoleon Bonaparte, occasioned by the publication of Scott's Life of Napoleon." It originally appeared in the Christian Examiner, and after having been extensively copied in Europe, has been republished, in this city, in a neat pamphlet form, by G. F. Hopkins & Son. It is strikingly characterized by moral force, by a severe and beautiful faculty of penetrating through the mist and glare of prejudice and passion, and of boldly marking out the distinctions between right and wrong, by a spirit of pure love to the human race, and by a stern and most unrelenting hatred, (if we may use the word,) of all who, under whatever disguise of genius or glory, would infringe upon their rights or oppose their progress, which will find a thrilling response in every bosom.

"The condition of Europe forbade, as we believe, the establishment of universal monarchy by mere physical force. The sword, however important, was now to play but a secondary part. The true course for Napoleon seems to us to have been indicated, not only by the state of Europe, but by the means which France in the beginning of her revolution had found most effectual. He should have identified himself with some great interests, opinion, or institutions, by which he might have bound to himself a large party in every nation. He should have contrived to make at least a specious cause against all old establishments. To contrast himself most strikingly and most advantageously with former governments, should have been the key of his policy. He should have placed himself at the head of a new order of things, which should have worn the face of an improvement of the social state. Nor did the subversion of republican forms prevent his adoption of this course, or of some other which would have secured to him the sympathy of multitudes. He might still have drawn some broad lines between his own administration and that of other states, tending to throw the old dynasties into the shade. He might have cast away all the pageantry and forms of courts, distinguished himself by the simplicity of his establishments, and exaggerated the relief which he gave to his people, by saving them the burdens of a wasteful and luxurious court. He might have insisted on the great benefits that had accrued to France from the establishment of uniform laws, which protected alike all classes of men; and he might have virtually pledged himself to the subversion of the feudal inequalities which still disfigured Europe. He might have insisted on the favorable changes to be introduced into property, by abolishing the entails which fettered it, the rights of primogeniture, and the exclusive privileges of a haughty aristocracy. He might have found abuses enough against which to array himself as a champion. By becoming the head of new institutions, which would have involved the transfer of power into new hands, and would have offered to the people a real improvement, he might every where have summoned to his standard the bold and enterprising, and might have disarmed the national prejudices to which he fell a prey. Revolution was still the true instrument of power. In a word, Napoleon lived at a period when he could only establish a durable and universal control, through principles and institutions of some kind or other, to which he would seem to be devoted.

"It was impossible, however, for such a man as Napoleon to adopt, perhaps to conceive, a system such as has now been traced; for it was wholly at war with that egotistical, self-relying, self-exaggerating principle, which was the most striking feature of his mind. He imagined himself able, not only to conquer nations, but to hold them together by the awe and admiration which his own character would inspire; and this bond he preferred to every other. An indirect sway, a control of nations by means of institutions, principles, or prejudices, of which he was to be only the apostle and defender, was utterly inconsistent with that vehemence of will, that passion for astonishing mankind, and that persuasion of his own invincibility, which were his master feelings, and which made force his darling instrument of dominion. He chose to be the great, palpable, and sole bond of his empire; to have his image reflected from every establishment; to be the centre, in which every ray of glory should meet, and from which every impulse should be propagated. In consequence of this egotism, he never dreamed of adapting himself to the moral condition of the world. The sword was his chosen weapon, and he used it without disguise. He insulted nations as well as sovereigns. He did not attempt to gild their chains, or to fit the yoke gently to their necks. The excess of his extortions, the audacity of his claims, and the insolent language in which Europe was spoken of as the vassal of the great empire, discovered, that he expected to reign, not only without linking himself with the interests, prejudices, and national feelings of men, but by setting all at defiance." ****

"There have been two circumstances, which have done much to disarm or weaken the strong moral reprobation with which Bonaparte ought to have been regarded, and which we deem worthy of notice. We refer to the wrongs which he is supposed to have suffered at St. Helena, and to the unworthy use which the Allied Powers have made of their triumph over Napoleon. First, his supposed wrongs at St. Helena have excited a sympathy in his behalf, which has thrown a veil over his crimes. We are not disposed to deny, that an unwarrantable, because unnecessary, severity was exercised towards Bonaparte. We think it not very creditable to the British government, that it tortured a sensitive captive by refusing him a title which he had long worn. We think that not only religion and humanity, but self-respect forbids us to inflict a single useless pang on a fallen foe. But we should be weak indeed, if the moral judgment and feelings, with which Napoleon's career ought to be reviewed, should give place to sympathy with the sufferings by which it was closed. With regard to the scruples, which not a few have expressed as to the right of banishing him to St. Helena, we can only say, that our consciences are not yet refined to any such exquisite delicacy, as to be at all sensitive on this particular. We admire nothing more in Bonaparte, than the effrontery with which he claimed protection from the laws of nations. That a man, who had set these laws at open defiance, should fly to them for shelter; that the oppressor of the world should claim its sympathy as an oppressed man, and that his claim should find advocates; these things are to be set down among the extraordinary events of this extraordinary age. Truly, the human race is in a pitiable state. It may be trampled on, spoiled, loaded like a beast of burden, made the prey of rapacity, insolence, and the sword; but it must not touch a hair, or disturb the pillow of one of its oppressors, unless it can find chapter and verse in the code of national law, to authorize its rudeness towards the privileged offender. For ourselves, we should rejoice to see every tyrant, whether a usurper or hereditary prince, fastened to a lonely rock in the ocean. Whoever gives clear, undoubted proof, that he is prepared and sternly resolved to make the earth a slaughterhouse, and to crush every will adverse to his own, ought to be caged like a wild beast: and to require mankind to proceed against him according to written laws and precedents, as if he were a private citizen in a quiet court of justice, is just as rational as to require a man, in imminent peril from an assassin, to wait and prosecute his murderer according to the most protracted forms of law.

"We confess, too, that we are not only unable to see the wrong done to Napoleon in sending him to St. Helena, but that we cannot muster up much sympathy for the inconveniences and privations which he endured there. Our sympathies in this particular are wayward and untractable. When we would carry them to that solitary island, and fasten them on the illustrious victim of British cruelty, they will not tarry there, but take their flight across the Mediterranean to Jaffa, and across the Atlantic to the platform where the Duke d'Enghien was shot, to the prison of Toussaint, and to the fields of battle where thousands at his bidding lay weltering in blood. When we strive to fix our thoughts upon the sufferings of the injured hero, other and more terrible sufferings, of which he was the cause, rush upon us; and his complaints, however loud and angry, are drowned by groans and execrations which fill our ears from every region which he traversed. We have no tears to spare for fallen greatness, when that greatness was founded in crime, and reared by force and perfidy. We reserve them for those on whose ruin it rose. We keep our sympathies for our race, for human nature in its humbler forms, for the impoverished peasant, the widowed mother, the violated virgin; and are even perverse enough to rejoice, that the ocean has a prisonhouse, where the author of those miseries may be safely lodged. Bonaparte's history is to us too solemn, the wrongs for which humanity and freedom arraign him, are too flagrant, to allow us to play the part of sentimentalists around his grave at St. Helena. We leave this to the more refined age in which we live; and we do so in the hope that an age is coming of less tender mould, but of loftier, sterner feeling, and of deeper sympathy with the whole human race. Should our humble page then live, we trust with an undoubting faith, that the uncompromising indignation with which we plead the cause of our oppressed and insulted nature, will not be set down to the account of our vindictiveness and hardness of heart.

"The series of events, which it has been our province to review, offers subjects of profound thought and solemn instruction to the moralist and politician. We have retraced it, with many painful feelings. It shows us a great people, who had caught some indistinct glimpses of freedom, and of a nobler and happier political constitution, betrayed by their leaders, and brought back, by a military despot, to heavier chains than they had broken. We see with indignation one man, a man like ourselves, subjecting whole nations to his absolute rule. It is this wrong and insult to our race which has chiefly moved us. Had a storm of God's ordination passed over Europe, prostrating its capitals, sweeping off its villages, burying millions in ruins, we should have wept, we should have trembled. But in this there would have been only wretchedness. Now we also see debasement. To us there is something radically, and increasingly shocking, in the thought of one man's will becoming a law to his race; in the thought of multitudes, of vast communities, surrendering conscience, intellect, their affections, their rights, their interests to the stern mandate of a fellow creature. When we see one word of a frail man on the throne of France, tearing a hundred thousand sons from their homes, breaking asunder the sacred ties of domestic life, sentencing myriads of the young to make murder their calling and rapacity their means of support, and extorting from nations their treasures to extend this ruinous sway, we are ready to ask ourselves, is not this a dream? And when the sad reality comes home to us, we blush for a race which can stoop to such an abject lot. At length, indeed, we see the tyrant humbled, stripped of power; but stripped by those who, with one exception, are not unwilling to play the despot on a narrower scale, and to break down the spirit of nations under the same iron sway."

MYTHOLOGY.

THE MONTH OF JULY IN NEW-YORK.

THE name of this month was given in honour of Julius Cæsar. The Saxons called it hay month, because then they generally cut their grass. It has been rendered memorable by the greatest and most important events, (except two,) ever recorded in history, sacred or profane. An event that marked the commencement of a new era that has already more or less remotely, affected the moral and political condition of every civilized region of the globe; that will ultimately lead to the entire regeneration of the world. It is unnecessary to add, that we allude to the Declaration of American Independence. This celebrated paper was published two hundred and sixty-four years after the discovery of America, one hundred and sixty from the first effectual settlement of Virginia, and one hundred and fifty from the settlement of Plymouth, in Massachusetts. In 1826, a coincidence occurred without a parallel in the records of man. On the fourth of July, of that year, John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, both expired, at advanced ages. Two patriarchs of the revolution, and the principal agents in securing the independence of their country. They had lived to see its fiftieth anniversary, and died in the excess of their patriotic enthusiasm.

Several days in this month have also been set apart for religious purposes, or devoted to celebrated personages, viz: the second, is called the Visitation of the Virgin Mary; the fifteenth, is St. Swithin's Day; twentieth, St. Margaret's; twenty-second, Mary Magdalen's; twenty-fifth, St. James's; and twenty-sixth, St. Ann's. On the twenty-third of this month, the sun enters the sign of Leo, or the Lion; the

Nemean monster, whose unpierced skin
The great Alcides wrapt his body in.

This animal, which was said to have been born of the hundred-headed Typhon, infested the neighbourhood of Nemea, a town of Argolis; and kept the inhabitants under continual alarms. The first of the twelve labors imposed on Hercules, by Eurystheus, was to destroy this monster; which, after a sharp and close combat, he finally effected, by choking him to death. He then carried the dead beast on his shoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after clothed himself with the skin. Much as Juno hated Hercules, she could not prevent his success; but afterwards vented her spleen by placing the Lion in the zodiac, as one of the twelve celestial constellations.

On the thirtieth day of this month commences that sultry period, known by the term of dog-days.

"Now Cepheus plainly shows his hidden fire,
The dog-star now his furious heat displays,
The Lion spreads his raging ire,
The sun brings parched days."

July in New-York, after the celebration of our great national anniversary, necessarily becomes somewhat dull and monotonous. The thermometer generally ranges from eighty-five to ninety degrees; and all who can afford it, fly from the heat, dust, and din of the city, to the pleasant and rural retreats, where the hills,

"Broad, round, and green, that in the southern sky,
With garniture of waving grass and grain,
Orchards and beechen forests, basking lie;
While deep the sunless glens are scoured between,
Where brawl o'er shallow beds the streams unseen."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Close of the Volume.—The eighth volume of this paper closes with the present number. It will hereafter appear in an enlarged form; no engravings will be published but those of a superior kind; and while increased care will be bestowed upon its typographical execution, new arrangements have been effected to improve the character of its literary contents. Its general circulation enables us to secure the talents of the best artists; and although many of the most eminent writers, from a generous interest in the periodical literature of the country, or from personal feelings of kindness towards ourselves, which we cannot too highly appreciate, have voluntarily and freely extended to us their valuable services, we have offered to others, less independent of pecuniary considerations, a just remuneration for such matter as we shall deem acceptable to our subscribers. Minute details will be found in the prospectus. We enter upon our ensuing labors with a confirmed confidence in the steady liberality of the public, and a pledge to use every possible exertion and expense in order to render the New-York Mirror an interesting and instructive family journal.

Grand Duke Constantine.—We select a brief account of this personage from Campbell's new journal, the "Metropolitan." This celebrated poet has abandoned the "New Monthly Magazine." It is said that his independence of opinion upon literary matters was displeasing to his publisher; but the author of the "Pleasures of Hope," and "Gertrude of Wyoming," needs no praises at this time, and it would be almost superfluous to wish his periodical success.

"The 'Grand Duke Constantine,' who has played so conspicuous a part in the affairs of Poland, is worthy of something more than a mere passing notice. Though possessed of very considerable talents, he is, in fact, an untamed tiger, giving way on all occasions to the most violent paroxysms of temper. He has a deep sense of the rights of his order, and holds the feelings of every other class of human beings as absolutely nought. So soon, therefore, as he found that his imperial brother was no longer the liberal patron of constitutional rights, he gave the most unrestrained license to his capricious and violent injustice. A few instances are better than general assertion: a most opulent and respectable man, named Woloski, the principal brewer of Warsaw, had, through some of his people without his own knowledge, hired as a servant in his establishment a Russian deserter. The offender was detected, and proof of innocence on the part of his employer being disallowed, the Grand Duke, by his individual decree, ordered this respectable individual to be fettered, and in that condition he was compelled to work with a wheel-barrow in the public streets! His daughter, an amiable young lady, ventured to appeal to the mercy of the Grand Duke in behalf of her parent; and the unmanly monster kicked her down stairs, using at the same time the most abusive language.

"A boy of nine years of age, a son of Count Plater, had, in the playfulness of childhood, written in chalk on one of the forms, 'The third of May for ever!' that being the anniversary of Kosciusko's constitution. The fact was discovered by some of the innumerable spies, employed even among these infants, to Nowozilyoff, who instituted an inquiry among the boys, not one of whom would betray poor Plater: they were all ordered to be flogged with the utmost severity. The unhappy offender declared that he had written the offensive words. The Grand Duke condemned him to be a soldier for life, incapable of advancement in the army; and when his mother threw herself before his carriage to implore forgiveness for her wretched child, he spurned her like a dog with his foot.

"Shaving the heads of ladies of rank who displeased him, was a common occurrence; and, on one occasion, four soldiers were hanged because they abstained from carrying such an order into effect, as they found it impossible to do so without using personal violence. Tarring and feathering the shaved heads of the offenders was also a favorite recreation of the commander in chief!"

Parisian Society.—The subjoined observations are copied from the Monthly Magazine. How far our own 'manners and customs,' as the geographers say, coincide with those described below, we will not undertake, at present, to determine. But we have a suspicion that, if titled foreigners, or very wealthy natives, are "ciphers" in the estimation of our countrymen, they hold places in the numeration table which give them an exaggerated and fictitious value. It is to be feared that, should some poor planet of a citizen, who had been all his life revolving in the orbit of his social duties, without any other claim to distinction than an upright character, intelligence, education and talent, be brought near any wandering star from the hemisphere of nobility in the old world, he would find himself rather eclipsed. The noblest praise of a society is, that throughout all its various circles, men are rated by their talents and virtue, not their riches and office. See how they "manage these things in France."

"The tone of society in Paris is very far from John Bullish. They do not ask what a man is worth, or whether his father is the owner of a tin mine or borough—but what has he to say, whether he is amiable or spiritual. In that case, (unless a marriage is on the tapis,) no one inquires whether his account at his banker's is high or low; or whether he has come in his carriage or on foot. An English soldier of fortune, or a great traveller, is listened to with some attention as a marked character; while a booby lord is no more regarded than his own footman in livery. The blank after a man's name is expected to be filled up with talent or adventures, or he passes for what he really is—a cipher."

Lotteries again.—The statement of Mr. Canfield, which charges the managers of the permutation system of lotteries with a secret and fraudulent arrangement of the prizes, is not correct. The arrangement of the lottery is not a secret one, nor susceptible of any improper influence. We wish, therefore, to be distinctly understood as disclaiming the slightest imputation upon the character of any one therein concerned, after having, as promised in our last, given the matter a more deliberate examination. Our previous remarks were not intended as a conclusion on the subject, but rather as a notice of the publication in the Argus. We have always endeavored to express our honest opinion upon events touching the interest of the city; we have no other object than the dissemination of an accurate knowledge of their affairs among the people, and are, therefore, pleased to have it in our power to avow implicit confidence in the integrity of the gentlemen against whom Mr. Canfield has let off his broadside of explanations.

Singular Coincidence.—The other day a ship from one of the ports in Ireland, reached a dock of this city. A young man, a native of Ireland, accidentally passing at the moment along the wharf, paused to observe the landing of the passengers. In an attempt to leap on land, one of these fell into the river and immediately sunk. The youth, who had lingered a moment to gratify his curiosity, plunged in promptly and rescued the drowning man, whom he suddenly recognized as his brother! Had any audacious author introduced such an unnatural incident in a romance, how he would have been lashed by the critics!

Awnings.—Would it not conduce much to the comfort of the citizens if the awnings in Broadway could be left unfurled on Sunday, during the prevalence of the extreme warm weather? The fair customers of the many stores in that thronged promenade would, doubtless, be grateful, and peradventure treat themselves to extra jewelry, shawls, and so forth, as a matter of duty.

Fourth of July.—Our National jubilee is coming "with all proper and convenient speed." The country folks are flocking to town; the citizens are prepared to fly into the country; and a pack of crackers, exploding under the nose of the ungarded passenger, reminds him that he dwells in a land of liberty, and that its birth-day is at hand. We congratulate the American people upon their continued independence, and we congratulate the newly-elected captains on the prospect of the ensuing parade; but most of all, we congratulate the little boys, those true disciples of fun, and merry professors of the genuine Epicurean philosophy. The firing of musketry and the cannon—the ringing of bells—the pomp of the processions, the glare and glitter of the troops, the pressure and jostle and thronging of the multitude, the swearing, fighting, and unusual confusion which mark our great annual holiday, are full of novelty to them. It is to be hoped that the police will be abroad; for pick-pockets sometimes lurk under the mask of patriots, although we do not believe patriotism is always what Dr. Johnson defined it, "the last refuge of a scoundrel." But, seriously, this day should never be forgotten—and when its proper observance is laid aside, it may be regarded as a symptom of the decline of that public spirit transmitted to us by the heroes of '76.

Beware of politeness!—We translate the following from a French paper:—"Sir, sir! you have dropped your papers!" cried a young man the other morning to a person passing. "Sir, I'm very much obliged to you," said the other, turning round and picking up a large bundle. "Excuse me," continued he, "but have I not the honor of addressing Mr. P.?" "That is my name," said the young man, with some surprise. "Ay, I thought so. I was very lucky in meeting you. I am an officer of the tribunal of commerce, and am ordered to arrest you on a bill of exchange for one thousand five hundred francs. The paper which you were so kind as to tell me I dropped, was the summons against you!"

Statue of Washington.—This valuable work by Canova, was destroyed in the fire which recently consumed the state house at Raleigh, North Carolina. As depriving us of a production of one of the greatest artists of the age, and now deceased, the accident is much to be lamented.

North American Review.—The contents of the seventy-second number of this journal for the first of July, are as follows:—I. The Laws of Population and Wages. II. The Poetry and Romance of the Italians. III. Origin and Progress of the Useful Arts. IV. Pennsylvania Biography. V. Defence of Mechanical Philosophy. VI. The Cherokee Case. VII. The Prospect of Reform in Europe. VIII. Popular Sports and Festivals. IX. Harvard University. X. Life and Character of Henry Brougham. XI. North-Eastern and Northern Boundary.

Dogs.—Our correspondent will perceive his favor upon this subject in a previous page. The law to which he alludes is very unpopular, as are they who have availed themselves of it from pecuniary considerations. In consequence of it a curious excitement has prevailed over the town, the effects of which were very visible. We saw an athletic ragged negro, bearing in his arms a beautiful little spaniel, and followed by a troop of boys treating him to several candid opinions of his character, and occasionally giving their exclamations emphasis by saluting him with a missile. Another disreputable looking reprobate, with a sinister cast of the eye, was dragging a pointer, apparently of considerable value, by a rope attached to his neck. The victim followed without making any secret of his reluctance, and opposed such resistance as lay in his power; but the fellow went whistling on his way, heedless of the frowns and muttered execrations of the crowd, and the occasional visitation of a clam-shell. A spirited boy crept up behind and cut the cord, whereat the pointer did, what any other sensible person would have done—he travelled off with a considerable exercise of his pedestrian powers in an opposite direction, without stopping to say "thank you," or to examine into particulars. The wretch was enraged, and, after an imprecation, rushed up to the boy with the purpose of doing him violence. The lad stood firm as a rock, with clenched fist and flashing eye, fully prepared to dare the unequal conflict, when a good-natured German, who might measure an inch over six feet, seized the bully coolly by the throat and deposited him head first in a pool, which the care of the street-commissioner had left probably for the purpose. The gentleman remained there a moment enjoying the otium cum dignitate—the ease with dignity—and then disappeared amid shouts of laughter.

Sea Serpent.—In the volume of the New-York Farmer for 1828, there is a communication from Dr. Mitchell, entitled "A notice of the occurrences in natural history in the United States of America," in the course of which he endeavors to disprove the existence of this leviathan. We are like to have the gentleman here to contradict the doctor in person, with a considerable addition to his length. The subjoined is copied from the New-York Daily Advertiser:

"This monster made his first appearance this season at Boothbay on Sunday last. He was seen again on Tuesday by two gentlemen, at a distance of about sixty feet, and afterwards by ten or twelve citizens of Boothbay, as he passed and repassed several times about one hundred and fifty feet distant from them. He is described by the editor of the Wiscasset Journal, who was on the spot, as from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet in length!"
